KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
ā as in fate, mane, dale.
ä as in far, father, guard.
å as in fall, talk, naught.
ȧ as in ask, fast, ant.
ã as in fare, hair, bear.

e as in met, pen, bless.
ē as in mete, meet, meat.
ė as in her, fern, heard.

i as in pin, it, biscuit.
ī as in pine, fight, file.

o as in not, on, frog.
ō as in note, poke, floor.
ö as in move, spoon, room.
ô as in nor, song, off.

u as in tub, son, blood.
ū as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty).
u̇ as in pull, book, could.
ü German ü, French u.

oi as in oil, joint, boy.
ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. Thus:

ạ as in prelate, courage, captain.
ẹ as in ablegate, episcopal.
ọ as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
ụ as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.). Thus:

a̤ as in errant, republican.
e̤ as in prudent, difference.
i̤ as in charity, density.
o̤ as in valor, actor, idiot.

ä̤ as in Persia, peninsula.
ė̤ as in the book.
ụ̈ as in nature, feature.

A mark (⌣) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh. Thus:

t͟ as in nature, adventure.
d͟ as in arduous, education.
s͟ as in pressure.
z͟ as in seizure.

th as in thin.
ŦH as in then.
ċh as in German ach, Scotch loch.
ṅ French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.
ly (in French words) French liquid (mouillé) l.
′ denotes a primary, ″ a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

SIGNS.

< read from; i. e., derived from.
> read whence; i. e., from which is derived.
\+ read and; i. e., compounded with, or with suffix.
= read cognate with; i. e., etymologically parallel with.
√ read root.
* read theoretical or alleged; i. e., theoretically assumed, or asserted but unverified, form.
† read obsolete.
★ refers, in all cases, to material which will be found in the supplementary pages. It is used in the cross-references, and is also placed above (rarely below) the initial letter of a word, when an addition to its definitions will be found in the supplementary pages at the end of one or another of the various volumes.

SPECIAL EXPLANATIONS.

A superior figure placed after a title-word indicates that the word so marked is distinct etymologically from other words, following or preceding it, spelled in the same manner and marked with different numbers. Thus:

back[1] (bak), n. The posterior part, etc.
back[1] (bak), a. Lying or being behind, etc.
back[1] (bak), v. To furnish with a back, etc.
back[1] (bak), adv. Behind, etc.
back[2]† (bak), n. The earlier form of bat[2]. back[3] (bak), n. A large flat-bottomed boat, etc.

Various abbreviations have been used in the credits to the quotations, as "No." for number, "st." for stanza, "p." for page, "l." for line, ¶ for paragraph, "fol." for folio. The method used in indicating the subdivisions of books will be understood by reference to the following plan:

Section only	§ 5.
Chapter only	xiv.
Canto only	xiv.
Book only	iii.
Book and chapter Part and chapter Book and line Book and page Act and scene Chapter and verse No. and page	iii. 10.
Volume and page	II. 34.
Volume and chapter	IV. iv.
Part, book, and chapter	II. iv. 12.
Part, canto, and stanza	II. iv. 12.
Chapter and section or ¶	vii. § or ¶ 3.
Volume, part, and section or ¶	I. i. § or ¶ 6.
Book, chapter, and section or ¶	I. i. § or ¶ 6.

Different grammatical phases of the same word are grouped under one head, and distinguished by the Roman numerals I., II., III., etc. This applies to transitive and intransitive uses of the same verb, to adjectives used also as nouns, to nouns used also as adjectives, to adverbs used also as prepositions or conjunctions, etc.

The capitalizing and italicizing of certain or all of the words in a synonym-list indicates that the words so distinguished are discriminated in the text immediately following, or under the title referred to.

The figures by which the synonym-lists are sometimes divided indicate the senses or definitions with which they are connected.

The title-words begin with a small (lower-case) letter, or with a capital, according to usage. When usage differs, in this matter, with the different senses of a word, the abbreviations [cap.] for "capital" and [l. c.] for "lower-case" are used to indicate this variation.

The difference observed in regard to the capitalizing of the second element in zoölogical and botanical terms is in accordance with the existing usage in the two sciences. Thus, in zoölogy, in a scientific name consisting of two words the second of which is derived from a proper name, only the first would be capitalized. But a name of similar derivation in botany would have the second element also capitalized.

The names of zoölogical and botanical classes, orders, families, genera, etc., have been uniformly italicized, in accordance with the present usage of scientific writers.

hoop[1] (höp or hůp), n. [< ME. hoope, hope, a hoop, < AS. hōp,* not found in the same sense of 'hoop,' but what seems to be essentially the same word is found in comp., fen-hōp, mōr-hōp (poet.), a hollow or pool, or a mound or hummock, or more prob. a recess, in a fen or moor; hōp-gehnæst (poet.), the dashing of the waves (against the shore of a bay?), deriv. hōpig (poet.), in hills and hollows (of the waves); also in compound place-names, as Éast-hōp, E. East-hope, Bethlinghōp, etc. (see hope[2], 2); further in comp. hōp-pāda, in a gloss, i. e. a 'hoop-tunic,' or circular cloak (?); = OFries. hōp, a hoop, band, = North Fries. hop, a hoop, band, ring, = D. hoep (also dim. hoepel), a hoop, = Icel. hōp, a small landlocked bay or inlet (named appar. from its circular form), > E. hope[3], a bay or inlet: see hope[2] and hope[3]. Root unknown.] 1. A circular band or flattened ring of wood, metal, or other material; especially, a band of wood or metal used to confine the staves of casks, tubs, etc., or for any similar purpose; also, that part of a finger-ring which surrounds the finger, as distinguished from the chaton.

A hoop of gold, a paltry ring
That she did give me. Shak., M. of V., v. 1.

The performance of leaping through barrels without heads, and through hoops, especially the latter, is an exploit of long standing. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 317.

2. A large ring of wood or iron for a child to trundle.

Trundling the hoop is a pastime of uncertain origin, but much in practice at present, and especially in London, where the boys appear with their hoops in the public streets, and are sometimes very troublesome to those who are passing through them.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 490.

Men whose understandings are narrowed by being brought into the society of men when they ought to have been spinning a top or twirling a hoop.
Mary Wollstonecraft, Rights of Woman, p. 82.

The rosy children . . . run past with hoops.
Dickens, Dombey and Son, xviii.

The boy . . .
Had tost his ball and flown his kite, and roll'd
His hoop to pleasure Edith.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. A circular band of stiff material serving to expand the skirt of a woman's dress: often used, either in the singular or in the plural, for the skirt itself so expanded. The hoop or hoop-skirt was evolved from the farthingale of the sixteenth century. (See farthingale.) The time of its greatest extravagance was the middle of the eighteenth century, when the bell-shaped skirt was expanded to enormous dimensions by hoops. At a later time the hoop consisted of two separate structures, one over each hip, the two being held together by a girdle. The use of hoops continued with some intermissions till about 1820. About 1852 skirts began to be expanded again by the use of crinoline petticoats (see crinoline), for which were afterward substituted underskirts (called hoop-skirts) with a series of hoops, at first of ratan and whalebone and afterward of flat flexible steel, which at times were nearly as large as those of a century earlier. They went out of use again about 1870.

Th' important charge, the petticoat, . . .
Though stiff with hoops, and arm'd with ribs of whale.
Pope, R. of the L., ii. 120.

But from the hoop's bewitching round,
Her very shoe has power to wound.
E. Moore, Spider and Bee, Fable x.

It may be noticed that by the end of 1787 hoops had almost entirely gone out of fashion.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 291.

4. Something resembling a hoop; anything circular: technically applied in botany to the overlapping edge of one of the valves of the frustule of the Diatomaceæ.

Hast thou forgot
The foul witch Sycorax, who, with age and envy,
Was grown into a hoop? Shak., Tempest, i. 2.

Each organism forms a small box, the silicious walls of which completely enclose a space; these walls in many, if not in all, species are formed by two distinct plates or valves, each possessing its own hoop, one of which embraces or slides over the other like the lid of a box. This hoop, connecting zone or belt, may be single, double, or of complex structure. Challenger Reports, II. 3.

5†. A certain quantity of drink, up to the first hoop on a quart pot (which was formerly bound with hoops like a barrel).

I believe hoopes in quart pots were invented that every man should take his hoope, and no more.
Nashe, Pierce Penilesse.

6†. An old English measure of capacity, variously estimated at from 1 to 4 pecks.

Half a hoop of corn.
Tullie, Siege of Carlisle, p. 22. (Halliwell.)

7. The casing inclosing a pair of millstones; also, a reinforcing band about one of the stones.
—Provisory hoop, in cask-making, a device for straining up and holding the staves. It consists of a chain and double screws for tightening it. See cut in next column.
—To set the cock on hoop. See cock[1].

Provisory Hoop.

hoop[1] (höp or hůp), v. t. [< ME. hoopen; from the noun.] 1. To bind or fasten with a hoop or with hoops; provide with a hoop: as, to hoop a barrel or puncheon.

Good son, loke thy bagges be hoopid at the mothe a-bove,
The surere mayst thow put in thy wyne vn-to thy behoue.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 128.

2. To clasp; encircle; surround.

Off with these robes of peace and clemency,
And let us hoop our aged limbs with steel,
And study tortures for this tyranny!
Beau. and Fl. (?), Faithful Friends, v. 2.

I hoop the firmament, and make
This my embrace the zodiack. Cleaveland.

hoop[2] (höp), v. and n. Same as whoop.

hoop[3]† (höp), n. [Also whoop, houpe, hoope; < F. huppe, OF. huppe, hupe = It. upupa, formerly also upega, < L. upupa = Gr. ἔποψ, a hoopoe; prob. orig. imitative of the bird's cry; hence the variation of forms. Cf. OHG. wituhopfo, -hoffo, MHG. witehopfe, G. wiedehopf, > appar. MD. weedhoppe, wedehoppe (also simply weede, wede, and hoppe, D. hop), a hoopoe, lit. 'wood-hopper,' < OHG. witu, = AS. widu, wudu, E. wood[1], + OHG. hopfōn,* MHG. G. hopfen = AS. hoppian, E. hop[1]; but the second element may have been suggested by the imitative name. Cf. Servian hupak, hupac, hoopoe; the general Slavic name is also imitative, in another form, OBulg. vŭdodŭ, vŭdidŭ, Bohem. dud, Pol. dudek, Russ. udodŭ, Little Russ. vdod, vudvud, udod, odud, udul, etc. See hoopoe, the form now in use.] Same as hoopoe.

hoop-ash (höp'ash), n. 1. A species of ash, Fraxinus nigra, so named from the use of its flexible wood in making hoops. Also called black ash, ground-ash.—2. The American nettle-tree, Celtis occidentalis. See hackberry.

hoop-bee (höp'bē), n. A fossorial bee of the genus Eucera.

hoop-cramp (höp'kramp), n. In coopering, a clutch for clasping and holding in position the lapped ends of a barrel-hoop.

hoop-driver (höp'drī″vėr), n. A hand-tool used in driving the hoops over a barrel; also, a power-machine for doing the same work.

hooper[1] (hö'pėr or hůp'ėr), n. [< hoop[1], v., + -er[1].] One who hoops casks or tubs; a cooper.

hooper[2] (hö'pėr), n. [< hoop[2] + -er[1]; its cry is said to resemble the syllable hoop.] The European whooping swan, Cygnus musicus: so called from its cry. It is one of several swans which have the windpipe peculiarly coiled in a cavity of the breast-bone, and the bill not tuberculate. The adult is snow-white, with black feet, and a black bill blotched with yellow.

hooper[3] (hö'pėr), n. Same as hoopoe.

hooper's-hide†, n. The game of blindman's-buff. Nares.

But Robbin finding him silly,
Most friendly took him aside,
The while that his wife with Willy
Was playing at hooper's hide.
The Winchester Wedding (old ballad).

hooping (hö'ping or hůp'ing), n. [Verbal n. of hoop[1], v.] 1. Hoops in general, or the materials used for hoops.—2. The hoops used in building or strengthening any article, as the hoops shrunk on a built-up gun.

For the whole length of the breech-screw, hooping is of no avail, for only longitudinal strains are here developed.
Michaelis, tr. of Monthaye's Krupp and De Bange, p. 77.

hooping-cough (hö'ping-kôf'), n. See whooping-cough.

hoop-iron (höp'ī″ėrn), n. Strap-iron or thin ribbon-iron from which hoops are made for baling cotton, securing packing-boxes, etc.

hoopkoop-plant (höp'köp-plant), n. [Etym. unknown.] A low, spreading leguminous plant, Lespedeza striata, originally from China or Japan, but introduced (about 1850) into the southern Atlantic States, where it is rapidly spreading in old fields and waste places. It is greedily eaten by cattle.

hoople (hö'pl), n. [Dim. of hoop[1], after D. hoepel, dim. of hoep.] A child's hoop, usually trundled with a wand called a hoople-stick. [New York, U. S.]

hoop-lock (höp'lok), n. A fastening formed by interlocking notches in the ends of a barrel-hoop.

hoop-net (höp'net), n. A net the mouth of which is stretched upon a hoop, as a handle-net, dip-net, scoop-net, etc. A hoop-net with a rectangular or circular opening is often used to capture fish under the ice.

hoopoe, hoopoo (hö'pō), n. [The form hoopoe was doubtless orig. pron. like hoopoo, which, with hoopoop, first appears about 1667–78; an imitative var. or clipped reduplication of the earlier hoop, appar. after L. upupa: see hoop[3].] A tenuirostral non-passerine bird of the family Upupidæ. The best-known species is Upupa epops, the common hoopoe of Europe, a bird about 12 inches long, with a slender, sharp, decurved bill about 2½ inches long, and a large, thin, compressed, and semicircular crest, erectile at will, on the head. The general color is buff of some shade, varied with black and white on the wings and tail. The bird is insectivorous and migratory, and is widely diffused in Europe, Asia, and Africa. There are several other species of Upupa. The birds of the neighboring family Irrisoridæ are known as wood-hoopoes. Also hooper.

Hoopoe (Upupa epops).

"Vannellus" (the lapwing) is a new-made name of the French "vanneau": which bird, by a great mistake, hath been generally taken to be the upupa of the ancients, which is now by all acknowledged to be the hoopoo.
Ray, Dictionarium Trilingue, p. 22.

You know the holy birds who run up and down on the Prado at Seville among the ladies' pretty feet—eh? with hooked noses and cinnamon crests? Of course. Hoopoes—Upupa, as the classics have it.
Kingsley, Westward Ho, xxvi.

hoopoop†, n. Same as hoopoe. Charleton.

hoop-petticoat (höp'pet″i-kōt), n. 1. Same as hoop-skirt.

Must we accept the costume of to-day, and carve, for example, a Venus in a hoop-petticoat?
Hawthorne, Marble Faun, xiv.

2. A plant, Narcissus Bulbocodium, a native of heaths in France, so called from the shape of its flowers. See narcissus.

The daffodil, the "pheasant-eye," and the hoop-petticoat are all narcissuses, and bloom freely in-doors.
J. Habberton, Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 367.

hoop-pine (höp'pīn), n. A large coniferous tree, Araucaria Cunninghami, a native of eastern Australia, where it attains a height of 200 feet and a diameter of 6 feet. Also called the Moreton Bay pine.

hoop-pole (höp'pōl), n. A smooth, straight shoot of green wood, usually a sapling of small diameter, for making hoops for casks. [U. S.]

The MD. hommel, Icel. humall, Sw. Dan. humle, > ML. humulus, hummulus, NL. humulus, the hop, may be ult. connected with hop[2]; but evidence is lacking.] 1. A plant, Humulus Lupulus, belonging to the family Moraceæ, with long twining stems and abundant 3- to 5-lobed leaves. The female flowers, which grow in strobiles or catkins, are used to impart a bitter flavor to malt liquors, and to preserve them from fermentation, their active properties depending on the presence of an aromatic and mildly narcotic resin, called lupulin, secreted by the scales and fruit. The hop-plant is a diœcious perennial, indigenous in temperate Europe, Asia, and North America. It is trained upon poles, and requires to be cultivated with great care; a full crop is not produced till the fourth or fifth year after planting. The hops when ripe are picked by hand, dried in a kiln called an oast, and packed into bags or pockets. They can be kept several years by tight packing. In medicine hops are used as a tonic and soporific, in tincture and infusion, and in some cases in bulk.

Male Flowering Branch (1) and Fruiting Branch (2) of Hop (Humulus Lupulus).

II. n. An adherent of the theological system founded by Hopkins and developed by Emmons and others.

Also called Hopkinsonian.

Hopkinsianism (hop-kin'zi-an-izm), n. [< Hopkinsian + -ism.] The theological principles or doctrines maintained by Dr. Samuel Hopkins.

Hopkinsianism was Calvinistic, and a development of the system taught by Jonathan Edwards. It laid especial stress on the sovereignty and decrees of God, election, the obligation of impenitent sinners to submit to the divine will, the overruling of evil to the good of the universe, sin and holiness as not inherent in man's nature apart from his exercise of the will and as belonging to each man exclusively and personally, eternity of future punishment, etc. As a distinct system Hopkinsianism no longer exists, but much of it reappears in the so-called New England theology.

Puritan theology had developed in New England into Edwardism, and then into Hopkinsianism, Emmonsism, and Taylorism. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 700.

Hopkinsonian (hop-kin-sō'ni-an), a. and n. [< Hopkins + -on-ian.] Same as Hopkinsian.

Hoplegnathidæ (hop-leg-nath'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hoplegnathus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, named from the genus Hoplegnathus. It is characterized by perfect ventral fins, the absence of a bony stay for the preoperculum, a continuous lateral line, naked jaws, and jaw-teeth confluent into a trenchant lamella. Four species are known as inhabitants of the Pacific ocean. Also erroneously written Hoplognathidæ.

Hoplegnathus (hop-leg'nā-thus), n. [NL. (originally Oplegnathus): so called in ref. to the form of the jaws, likened to a horse's hoof; irreg. < Gr. ὁπλή, hoof (< ὅπλον, a shield, ὅπλα, arms), + γνάθος, jaw.] The typical genus of the family Hoplegnathidæ, remarkable for the exposed naked jaws, which somewhat resemble the margin of a hoof.

Hoplia (hop′li-ä), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1803), < Gr. ὅπλα, arms: see hoplite.] A large genus of scarabæoid beetles, typical of the family Hopliidæ, having the last abdominal segment very short and the pygidium vertical in both sexes. There are more than 100 species, of all parts of the world; 12 are North American.

Hoplichthyidæ (hop-lik-thī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hoplichthys + -idæ.] A family of fishes, represented by the genus Hoplichthys. The body and head are much depressed, a single dorsal row and on each side a lateral row of large plates are developed, the body is bony, and the interoperculum is reduced and separated from the other opercular bones. The only known species, Hoplichthys langsdorffi, is an inhabitant of the Japanese seas.

Hoplichthys (hop-lik′this), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλον, a large shield, + ἰχθύς, a fish.] A genus of fishes, representing the family Hoplichthyidæ. Also written Oplichthys.

Hopliidæ (hop-lī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hoplia + -idæ.] A family of the melolonthid group of scarabæoid beetles, proposed by Burmeister in 1844, but not generally adopted.

hoplite (hop′līt), n. [< L. hoplites, < Gr. ὁπλίτης, a heavy-armed foot-soldier, < ὅπλον, lit. an implement or tool, pl. ὅπλα, implements of war, arms and armor.] In Gr. antiq., a heavy-armed foot-soldier, armed with helmet, cuirass or thorax, and greaves, and bearing a large shield, and, as weapons, a sword, one or more spears or javelins, and sometimes a battle-ax.

Hoplite.—Achilles and Troilus, from a cup by Euphronius, about 480 B. C.

Hoplocephalus (hop-lō-sef′a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλον, a large shield, + κεφαλή, head.] An Australian genus of venomous serpents, of the family Elapidæ, having smooth scales in from 15 to 21 rows, entire subcaudal scutes, and no distinct neck. They are viviparous, very poisonous, and when irritated spread the neck to some extent like a cobra. H. superbus is an example. G. Cuvier, 1829.

Hoplonemertea (hop″lō-ne-mėr′tē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλα, arms, armor, + NL. Nemertea, q. v.] A division of nemertean worms, correlated with Schizonemertea and Palæonemertea, containing those in which the mouth is in front of the ganglia and the proboscis is armed with a stylet, as in Nemertes proper, Amphiporus, etc. Hubrecht. Same as Tremacephalidæ (Keferstein).

hoplonemertean (hop″lō-ne-mėr′tē-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hoplonemertea.

II. n. One of the Hoplonemertea.

hoplonemertine (hop″lō-ne-mėr′tin), a. and n. Same as hoplonemertean.

Hoplonemertini (hop-lō-nem-ėr-tī′nī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλα, arms, armor, + NL. Nemertini, q. v.] Same as Hoplonemertea.

Hoplophoridæ (hop-lō-for′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hoplophorus + -idæ.] A family of fossil armadillos of South America, named from the genus Hoplophorus; the glyptodons: same as Glyptodontidæ, 1. See cut under Glyptodon.

Hoplophorus (hop-lof′ō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὁπλοφόρος, bearing arms, armed, < ὅπλα, arms, armor, + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] 1. A genus of crustaceans. Also written Oplophorus. Milne-Edwards, 1837.—2. The typical genus of Hoplophoridæ. Several species are described from the Pleistocene of South America, as H. euphractus, H. ornatus. Lund, 1839.

Hoplopidæ (hop-lop′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hoplopus + -idæ.] A family of mites, typified by the genus Hoplopus. Also Hoplopini. Canestrini and Fanzago, 1877.

hoplopleurid (hop-lō-plō′rid), n. A fish of the family Hoplopleuridæ.

Hoplopleuridæ (hop-lō-plō′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλα, arms, armor, + πλευρά, rib, + -idæ.] A family of extinct Cretaceous and early Tertiary fishes, with the body generally provided with four rows of subtriangular scutes with intermediate scale-like smaller ones, and the head long and with produced jaws. It includes the genera Dercetis, Leptotrachelus, Saurorhamphus, etc. Dercetidæ is a partial synonym.

Hoplopterus (hop-lop′tē-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλα, arms, armor, + πτερόν, a wing.] A genus of plovers having a horny spine on each wing; the spur-winged plovers. H. spinosus is an example. C. L. Bonaparte, 1831.

Hoplopus (hop′lō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὅπλα, arms, armor, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In entom.: (a) A genus of scarabæoid beetles: synonymous with Anomala. Samouelle, 1819. (b) A genus of wasps, of the family Odyneridæ, with about 20 European species. Also, improperly, Oplopus. Wesmael, 1833. (c) In Arachnida, a genus of mites, typical of the family Hoplopidæ, erected for the reception of the Cæculus echinipes of Dufour when this mite was proved to possess eyes. Canestrini and Fanzago, 1877.

hop-marjoram (hop′mär″jō-ram), n. A small labiate plant, Origanum Dictamnus, a native of Crete.

hop-medick (hop′med″ik), n. Same as hop-trefoil, 2.

hop-mildew (hop′mil″dū), n. A fungus, Sphærotheca humuli, living upon the hop.

hop-oil (hop′oil), n. An acrid oil obtained by distilling with steam the flower-heads of the hop, Humulus Lupulus.

hop-o′-my-thumb (hop′o̤-mī-thum′), n. [For hop on my thumb, early mod. E. hoppe upon my thombe (Palsgrave), meaning a person so small that he can hop or dance upon one's thumb.] A tiny dwarf: sometimes applied in derision to a diminutive person.

> He . . . was always wild ever since he was a hop-o′-my thumb no higher than the window-locker.
> Hone's Every-day Book, II. 67.

> At the next station we drank large quantities of hot milk, flavored with butter, sugar, and cinnamon, and then pushed on, with another chubby hop-o′-my-thumb as guide and driver. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 58.

★hopper[1] (hop′ėr), n. [< ME. hopper, hoper, a mill-hopper, a seed-basket, a basket (not found in lit. sense), < AS. hoppere*, a dancer (a masc. form to hoppestre, a female dancer (see hoppestere), not found, and probably an invention of Somner's), < hoppian, hop: see hop[1].] 1. One who or that which hops.

> Here were a hopper to hop for the ring.
> J. Heywood, The Four P's.

Specifically—(a) A cheese-hopper. (b) A butterfly: same as skipper. (c) A grasshopper. (d) A saltatorial homopterous insect; a cercopid, in a broad sense: as, a frog*hopper;* a tree-hopper. (e) A saltatorial beetle; one of the Halticidæ. (f) A seal of the second year. [Newfoundland.] (g†) A wild swan. Withals, Dict. (ed. 1608), p. 24.

2. pl. A game in which the players hop or leap on one leg; hop-scotch.—3. A trough, usually shaped like an inverted cone, through which grain or anything to be ground or crushed passes into a mill: so called because at one time it had a hopping or shaking motion. It is now stationary, and leads the grain to the shaking-shoe.

> The feed hopper of the thrashing-machine.
> Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 26.

4. A tray or basket in which a sower carries seed; a seed-basket.

> He heng an hoper on his bac in stude of a scrippe,
> A busschel of bred-corn he bringeth ther-inne.
> Piers Plowman (A), vii. 57.

5. A boat having a compartment with a movable bottom, to receive the mud or gravel from a dredging-machine and convey it to deep water, where, on opening the bottom, the mud or gravel falls out. Also called hopper-barge.—6. Same as hopper-car.

> Of the fifty-seven hoppers thrown over Opequan bridge, one-half can be put into suitable order again.
> New York Tribune, June 10, 1862.

7. In a double-action pianoforte movement, a piece attached to the back of a key to raise the hammer. It permits the key to escape from the hammer after having impelled it, so that the hammer can immediately fall away from the string. Also called grasshopper.

8. Same as hoppet, 3.

hopper[2] (hop′ėr), n. [< hop[2], v. i., + -er[1].] 1. A hop-picker.

> Many of these hoppers are Irish, but many come from London. Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, xi.

2. In brewing, a vat in which the infusion of hops is prepared to be added to the wort.

hopper-boy (hop′ėr-boi), n. A rake moving in a circle, used in mills to draw the meal over an opening in the floor, through which it falls.

hopper-cake (hop′ėr-kāk), n. [Cf. hockey-cake.] A seed-cake with plums on it, with which farmers treat their servants when seed-time is finished. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

hopper-car (hop′ėr-kär), n. On railroads, a car for carrying coal, gravel, etc., in form resembling the hopper of a mill. Also hopper.

hopper-closet (hop′ėr-kloz″et), n. A water-closet having a pan standing above a trap and kept clean by flushing.

hopper-hipped† (hop′ėr-hipt), a. Lame in the hip.

> She is bow-legged, hopper-hipped.
> Wycherley, Love in a Wood, ii. 1.

hopper-hood (hop′ėr-hůd), n. A hooded seal in its second year; a bedlamer.

hop-pest (hop′pest), n. An insect specially injurious to hops.

hoppesteret, n. [ME., mod. E. as if hopster*, lit. a danceress, < AS. hoppestre, a danceress, a female dancer, < hoppian, hop, dance, + -stre, fem. suffix, E. -ster.] A woman who dances.

> Yet sawgh I brent the schippes hoppesteres,
> The hunte strangled with the wilde beres.
> Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1159.

[That is, literally, 'Further I saw burnt the dancing ships, the hunter strangled with the wilde beres.' The true explanation appears on comparing the original bellatrices carinæ (Statius, Thebaid, vii. 57), lit. 'warlike ships,' bellatrices being misread as ballatrices*, fem. of LL. ballator, a dancer (> Sp. Pg. bailador, a dancer: see bayadere), < ballare, dance: see ball[2].]

hoppet (hop′et), v. i. [< ME. hoppeten*, < AS. hoppetan, hop: see hop[1], v.] To hop. [Prov. Eng.]

The initial h is unoriginal, and is due to the French.] 1. A tribe or troop of Asiatic nomads dwelling in tents or wagons, and migrating from place to place to procure pasturage for their cattle, or for war or plunder.

His [a Tatar's] hord, which consisted of about a thousand housholds of a kindred. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 421.

Hence—2. A gang; a migratory crew; a multitude.—3. A tribe in the most primitive stage of social organization, having no recognized subdivisions based on blood-relationship.

Each valley, each sequestered glen,
Mustered its little horde of men.
Scott, L. of the L., iii. 24.

Society is now one polish'd horde, Form'd of two mighty tribes, the Bores and Bored.
Byron, Don Juan, xiii. 95.

Golden Horde, a name given to the possessors of the khanate of Kiptchak, a Mongol realm in eastern Russia and western and central Asia. This realm was founded in the thirteenth century and overthrown in 1480.

horde (hōrd), v. i.; pret. and pp. horded, ppr. hording. [< horde, n.] To live in hordes; huddle together like the members of a migratory tribe: usually followed by together. Byron.

hordeaceous (hôr-dē-ā′shius), a. [< L. hordeaceus, of or relating to barley, < hordeum, barley: see Hordeum.] Barley-like; resembling barley.

Hordeeæ (hôr-dē′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hordeum + -eæ.] A tribe of grasses typified by the genus Hordeum; the barley tribe. The spikelets are one- to many-flowered, sessile on opposite sides of a zigzag-jointed rachis, which is excavated or channeled on one side of each joint, forming a spike; glumes frequently abortive or wanting. The name has also been written Hordeæ and Hordeineæ.

hordein, hordeine (hôr′dē-in), n. [< L. hordeum, barley, + *-in*², *-ine*².] A pulverulent substance left undissolved on treating barley-starch with acidulated water. It is not a simple body, but a mixture of starch-cellulose and a proteid. Watts, Dict. of Chem.

hordeolum (hôr-dē′ō-lum), n.; pl. hordeola (-lä). [NL., neut., < LL. hordeolus, m., a sty (so called as resembling in size or shape a grain of barley), dim. of L. hordeum, barley.] In pathol., a sty or small inflammatory tumor on the edge of the eyelid.

Hordeum (hôr′dē-um), n. [L., also ordeum, OL. fordeum, barley, = OHG. gerstā, MHG. G. gerste = D. gerst, barley; perhaps connected with L. horrere, bristle, Skt. √ harsh, bristle, said of the hair: see horrent and horrid.] A genus of grasses, the barley, type of the tribe Hordeeæ, characterized by having the spikelets 1-flowered, 3 at each joint, but the 2 lateral usually sterile, and the glumes 6 in number, forming a kind of involucre, side by side in front of the spikelets, slender and pointed with an awn or of the form of a bristle. The grain is ovoid-oblong or narrow, adherent to the palets. About 20 species are known, natives of boreal Europe, Africa, temperate Asia, and America, including H. sylvaticum, the wood-barley of Europe; H. nodosum, the meadow-barley of Europe and North America; H. murinum, the mouse- or wall-barley of Europe; H. maritimum, the sea-barley or squirrel-tail grass of western Europe; and H. jubatum, the American squirrel-tail grass. The cultivated barley belongs here, but the exact origin of the several forms under cultivation is obscure.

Called the apparent, sensible, or visible horizon, in distinction from the astronomical horizon (which see, below).

When the morning sun shall raise his car
Above the border of this horizon.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 7.

Hence—2. The line that bounds the view; the limit of vision.

Our horizon is never quite at our elbows.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 141.

3. Figuratively, the limit of intellectual perception, of experience, or of knowledge.

The history of one horizon of life is that its own completion but prepares the way for a higher one, furnishing the latter with conditions of a still further development.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 433.

4. In geol., a stratum or group of strata characterized by the presence of a particular fossil not found in the underlying or overlying beds, or of a peculiar assemblage of fossils. Such a bed or series of beds is often designated as the zone of the fossil or group of fossils in question, and such a distinctly marked division is sometimes called a horizon, as forming a convenient plane of reference for other groups of strata occurring above and below, and not so definitely marked by peculiar fossil contents.

Lepidodendra are especially characteristic trees of this horizon. Dawson, Geol. Hist. of Plants, App., p. 277.

5. In zoöl. and anat., a level or horizontal line or surface: as, the horizon of the teeth; the horizon of the diaphragm.—Artificial horizon, a contrivance for enabling an observer to determine the altitude of a star above the horizon when the horizon itself is not visible. It consists of a small hollow trough containing quicksilver or any other fluid the surface of which affords a reflected image of a celestial body. The angle subtended at the eye by the star and its image in a fluid being double the star's altitude, this angle, when measured and halved, gives the altitude of the star.—Astronomical horizon, the great circle of the celestial sphere midway between the zenith and nadir, its plane being perpendicular to gravity at any station.—Celestial horizon. Same as astronomi- cal horizon.—Geographical horizon, a great circle of the terrestrial sphere, having any given station as its pole. The sensible horizon, or horizontal plane tangent to the surface of the earth at a given station, is sometimes distinguished from the rational horizon, or plane parallel to the sensible horizon passing through the center of the earth. —Horizon of an artificial globe, the broad horizontal ring in which the globe is fixed. On this are several concentric circles, which contain the months and days of the year, the corresponding signs and degrees of the ecliptic, and the thirty-two points of the compass.—On the same horizon, in geol., said of fossils or strata which appear to be of the same age.—Physical horizon, the circle of tangency with the terrestrial sphere, or geoid, of a cone having its vertex at the eye of the observer.—Rational or true horizon. Same as astronomical horizon.—Visible horizon. See def. 1.

horizon-glass (hō-rī′zǫn-glȧs), n. In astron., the small plane mirror which is firmly attached to the frame of a quadrant or sextant, and has one half silvered. In measuring an altitude of the sun the observer looks directly through its transparent half toward the horizon at the point directly under the sun. Formerly two horizon-glasses were often used, one the front glass as above described, the other, the back glass, so placed that the observer looked through it to the point of the horizon opposite to that under the sun: this glass had simply a narrow unsilvered strip across its middle.

horizontal (hor-i-zon′tal), a. and n. [= D. horizontaal = G. horizontal = Dan. Sw. horisontal = F. Sp. Pg. horizontal = It. orizzontale, ‹ ML. horizontalis,* ‹ L. horizon, horizon: see horizon.]

I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the horizon.

> As when the sun new-risen
> Looks through the horizontal misty air, > Shorn of his beams. Milton, P. L., i. 595.

2. Parallel to the horizon; at right angles to the direction of gravity at any station; being on a level; not vertical nor inclined: as, a horizontal line or surface; a horizontal position. Specifically—(a) In mech., acting or working, or placed, wholly or with respect to its main parts, in a level plane: as, a horizontal drill; a horizontal boring-machine; a horizontal saw-mill and mortising-machine; a horizontal pump; a horizontal escapement; a horizontal steam-engine. (b) In zoöl., being, as the parts, organs, surfaces, marks, etc., of a bilaterally symmetrical animal, parallel to a plane supposed to extend from end to end and from side to side of the body: as, horizontal wings (those which, in repose, lie flat over the body, so as to be parallel to the supposed plane).

3. Measured or contained in a plane of the horizon: as, horizontal distance.—Horizontal bar, battery, cornice, distance, leaf, mill, parallax, etc. See the nouns.—Horizontal line. (a) In persp., the intersection of the horizontal and perspective planes; an imaginary line crossing a picture parallel to its base or bottom line, and at the assumed level of the eye of the observer. (b) In figured bass, a dash under a note indicating that the tones of the last figured chord are to be continued without regard to the tone of the bass.—Horizontal line of Camper, in craniom., the intersection of the horizontal plane of Camper with the median plane of the head.—Horizontal plane, a plane parallel to the horizon, or not inclined to it; in persp., a plane parallel to the horizon, passing through the eye and cutting the perspective plane at right angles.—Horizontal plane of Camper, in craniom., the plane passing through the center of the external auditory meatus on either side and the inferior nasal spine.—Horizontal projection, a projection made on a plane parallel to the horizon.—Horizontal range of a projectile, the distance at which it falls on or strikes a horizontal plane, whatever be the angle of elevation.—Horizontal root, steam-engine, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. In craniom., the plane taken as the horizontal datum-plane of cranial measurements. See horizontalization.

horizontality (hor″i-zon-tal′i-ti), n. [‹ horizontal + -ity.] The state of being horizontal.

> No vase nor statue breaks the dead horizontality of the parapet. The American, XIII. 57.

horizontalization (hor-i-zon″tal-i-zā′shǫn), n. [‹ horizontal + -ize + -ation.] In craniom., the act of placing the skull for craniometrical measurement so that the plane taken as the horizontal datum-plane shall be truly horizontal. Anthropologists are not entirely agreed on a horizontal datum-plane. Some use the alveolocondylean plane, that is, a plane passing through the alveolar point tangent to the condyles; others use a plane passing through the lower edge of the orbital cavity and the upper rim of the external ear. These planes nearly coincide with that of the orbital axes. When the skull is fragmentary the selection of other datum-planes is necessary.

horizontally (hor-i-zon′tal-i), adv. In a horizontal direction or position; in the direction of the horizon; on a level: as, a line stretched horizontally.

> It is occasionally requisite that the object-end of the instrument be moved up and down as well as horizontally or equatorially. Paley, Nat. Theol., viii.

horkey (hôr′ki), n. Same as hockey[2].

horkey-load (hôr′ki-lōd), n. Same as hockey-load.

Hormaphis (hôr′mā-fis), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὅρμος, a cord, chain, necklace, + NL. aphis.] A genus of plant-lice founded by Osten-Sacken in 1861, having the antennal joints deeply incised and well separated, and the first two oblique veins of the fore wings uniting in a fork. The spinous gall-louse, H. spinosus, forms on the stems of wych-hazel a gall, which is a deformation of the flower-bud.

Horminum (hôr-mī′num), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), ‹ Gr. ὅρμινον, a kind of sage.] A monotypic genus of plants belonging to the family Menthaceæ, the type of Endlicher's subtribe Hormineæ, to which Engler gives tribal rank. It is characterized by having the calyx 2-lipped; the corolla with incurved, ascending tube; the anthers linear, 1-celled, confluent; leaves mostly radical, dentate, the upper reduced to narrow bracts; whorls 6-flowered; flowers violet-purple. The single species, H. Pyrenaicum, is a native of the mountains of Europe. Bentham made Horminum a section of the genus Salvia; Moench, a subgenus of Mentha; Tournefort, a synonym for the genus Salvia.

hormogonimium (hôr″mǫ-gǫ-nim′i-um), n.; pl. hormogonimia (-ä). [NL., ‹ Gr. ὅρμος, a cord, chain, + γόνιμος, productive: see gonimium.] One of the common forms of gonimia of lichens, especially characteristic of the Collemaceæ. It is small, moniliform, and contained in a syngonimium.

hormogonium (hôr-mǫ-gō′ni-um), n.; pl. hormogonia (-ä). [NL., ‹ Gr. ὅρμος, a cord, chain, + γόνος, offspring.] In bot., a special reproductive body in the blue-green algæ, having the form of a chain of roundish cells, from which new filaments are formed. Also hormogone.

hormogonous (hôr-mog′ǫ-nus), a. [As hormogon-ium + -ous.] Possessing or resembling a hormogonium.

hormone (hôr′mōn), n. [‹ Gr. ὁρμῶν, ppr. of ὁρμᾶν, set in motion.] A substance secreted or formed in some organ or tissue and carried thence in the blood to another organ or tissue which it stimulates to functional activity. It is by means of hormones that the various organic functions are regulated and synchronized; thus, when the mass of partly digested food from the stomach enters the duodenum, it excites the cells of this part of the bowel to secrete a hormone, called secretin; this is carried to the pancreas and causes this organ to secrete a fluid which further digests the food newly arrived in the bowel.

Hormospermeæ (hôr-mǫ-spėr′mē-ē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὅρμος, a cord, chain, + σπέρμα, a seed, + -eæ.] One of the principal divisions of the Florideæ, as proposed by Agardh (1851).

horn (hôrn), n. [‹ ME. horn, ‹ AS. horn = OS. horn (in comp.) = OFries. horn = OD. horn, horen, D. horen = MLG. horen, LG. horn = OHG. MHG. G. horn = Icel. Sw. Dan. horn = Goth. haurn = L. cornu (> ult. E. corn[2], cornet, etc.) = W. Gael. and Ir. corn (the Old Celtic form is represented by the entry κάρνον, trumpet, in Hesychius), a horn; with formative -n, akin to Gr. κέρας (κερατ-), a horn (see cerato- and carat), with formative -t; of the same root as AS. heorot, heort, E. hart, and L. cervus, deer: see hart[1] and Cervus. See hornet.] 1. An excrescent growth upon the head in certain animals, serving as a weapon of offense or defense. See def. 3. The horns of cattle, sheep, and goats are familiar examples. Such horns, technically called cornua cava or hollow horns, are permanent or non-deciduous; they always grow upon the head, and are hollow, being formed upon a solid core of true bone. They are usually in one pair, right and left; sometimes in two pairs. The horns of rhinoceroses are solid. There may also be but one, as in some species, or there may be two placed one behind the other, as in others. True horns are distinguished from antlers by being hollow, permanent, and unbranched (except in the pronghorn antelope). They occur usually in both sexes. See Cavicornia, cornu.

> And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns. Rev. xiii. 1.
> It is said, "God sends a curst cow short horns." Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1.

2. An antler of a deer. Antlers are not true horns, but are bony, solid, and deciduous, and are for the most part confined to the male sex. They are technically called cornua solida or cornua deciduа (that is, solid or deciduous horns). See antler.

3. Hardened and thickened epidermis or cuticle, as that of which nails, claws, and hoofs consist, differing from hair or other cuticular structures chiefly in density and massiveness. The character of horn as a cuticular outgrowth or appendage is well illustrated in the pronghorn antelope, in which the transition from a mass of agglutinated hairs covering a bony core of the frontal bone to hard horny substance at the tip is very gradual and readily observed. The thickened skin of the human heel is horn, and similar special thickenings are called corns. Tortoise-shell is another kind of horn, as are also the hard covering of the beak and feet of birds, the scales of reptiles, etc. Horn in this sense is related to bone or cartilage only in that it belongs to the same general group of connective tissues.

> Neatly secur'd from being soil'd or torn,
> Beneath a pane of thin translucent horn,
> A book. Cowper, Tirocinium, l. 120.

4. Something made of horn, or like or likened to a horn in position, shape, use, or purpose.

> The conquering Brute on Corineus brave
> This horn of land bestow'd, and mark'd it with his name. Drayton, Polyolbion, i. 505.
> We skirt the western horn of Sabioncello, and another turn leads us through the channel. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 192.
>
> The wood which grides and clangs
> Its leafless ribs and iron horns. Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvii.

Specifically—(a) A feeler; a tentacle; an antenna; an ovipositor; also, the tuft of feathers upon the head of sundry birds, resembling a horn; a plumicorn, as that of various owls.

> As the snail, whose tender horns being hit, > Shrinks backward in his shelly cave with pain. Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 1033.

(b) A wind-instrument more or less resembling a horn in shape and size, and originally made of horn: as, a hunting-horn; a tin horn. In the simpler forms the horn is used chiefly to give signals, producing single or slightly variable loud tones. The hunting-horn, however, was early elaborated and made capable of producing a variety of calls, fanfares, and simple tunes. Wood, ivory, and various metals have been used for making horns.

> He's blawn his horn sae sharp and shrill;
> Up start the deer on every hill. Bothwell (Child's Ballads, I. 159).
>
> With horns and trumpets now to madness swell,
> Now sink in sorrows with a tolling bell. Pope, Dunciad, ii. 228.
> Waked at dead of night, I heard a sound
> As of a silver horn from o'er the hills > Blown. Tennyson, Holy Grail.

(c) By extension, a musical wind-instrument of the trumpet class, developed from the hunting-horn (previously modified for use in orchestras under the name corno di caccia), and distinctively called the French horn, having a slender tube of brass or silver, several feet long, gracefully curved upon itself, terminating in a flaring bell, and blown through a mouthpiece of conoidal bore. Its tones are harmonics of the natural tone of the tube, produced by slightly varying the method and pressure of the blowing. Its compass is about four octaves, the series of tones in the two upper octaves being diatonic and partially chromatic. In addition to these primary or open tones, modified or closed tones are produced by inserting the hand into the bell, so as to alter the pitch of an open tone chromatically. The pitch of the fundamental tone, and thus of the whole series of open tones, is altered by detachable crooks, which increase the actual length of the tube. From eight to twelve such crooks are made, pitching the instrument in nearly all the chromatic keys between the second C below middle C and the second B♭ below that. The key in which the instrument is to be set is indicated at the beginning of each piece; but the music is written in the key of C. The pitch of the tube is still further affected by the tuning-slide, which is one of the curves of the tube so arranged that it can be pushed in or out at will. Ventils or valves are sometimes added to the tube to facilitate rapid passages. Horns are the most valuable orchestral instruments of their class. Their tone is mellow, pervasive, and blending, with a peculiar romantic quality. The French horn is sometimes used singly or as a solo instrument, but in orchestras it is nearly always combined in pairs or in quartets, and used both for melodic effects, especially in fanfares and similar figures, and for sustained chords as a harmonic basis for free instrumentation. (d) A drinking-vessel of the shape of a horn or made of a horn. See drinking-horn.

1, coaching-horn; 2, French or orchestral horn; 3, flügelhorn, or keyed bugle; 4, post-horn; 5, hunting-horn.

> They attended the banquet and served the heroes with horns of mead and ale. Mason, Notes on Gray's Poems.
> They sit with knife in meat and wine in horn. Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

(e) A long projection, frequently of silver or gold, worn on the forehead by natives of some Asiatic countries. (f) One of the extremities (cusps) of the moon when waxing and waning, and hence of any crescent-shaped object.

I saw a dolphin hang i' the horns of the moon, Shot from a wave.
Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, i. 1.

The angelic squadron bright Turn'd fiery red, sharpening in mooned horns
Their phalanx. Milton, P. L., iv. 978.

Ere ten moons had sharpen'd either horn. Dryden.

The horns, or extremities of the bow, were two large tufts of cocoa-nut-trees. Cook, Voyages, I. i. 7.

(g) The horn of a cow or other animal, or, now, any similar case or flask, used for holding gunpowder; a powder-horn or powder-flask.

Each man . . . places a ball in the palm of his hand, pouring as much powder from his horn upon it as will cover it. Audubon, Ornith. Biog., I. 293.

(h) pl. A head-dress worn during the first half of the fifteenth century, the general shape of which was that of a pair of horns spreading like those of an ox. These head-dresses consisted of stuffs embroidered and set with jewels, or of nets (compare crespine) by which the hair was entirely or almost entirely concealed, a veil covering the whole. (i) A projecting part of a head-dress, especially of that of women in the fourteenth century. (j) Eccles., either of the corners or angles made by the front and ends of an altar. In Christian churches, that at the left of the priest when facing the altar is the gospel horn; that at his right, the epistle horn.

Bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar. Ps. cxviii. 27.

(k) In the Bible, a symbol of strength, power, or glory.

All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted. Ps. lxxv. 10.

And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David. Luke i. 69.

(l) In railroad-cars, a part rigidly fastened to the coupler or draw-bar, by means of which the coupler and buffer-springs are connected. Car-Builder's Dict. (m) Either of two projections on a side-saddle, serving to support the right leg. (n†) The beak of an anvil. (o) A branch of a subdivided stream.

With sevenfold horns mysterious Nile Surrounds the skirts of Egypt's fruitful soil.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 409.

If I have horns to make me mad, let the proverb go with me; I'll be horn mad. Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 5.

(s) In bot., any process or appendage which is shaped somewhat like the horn of an animal, as the spur of the petals in Linaria, or the crest borne by the hoods in Asclepias.

5. A draught of strong liquor: as, to take a horn. See def. 4 (d). [Colloq.]

The chaplain gave us a pretty stiff horn of liquor apiece. W. E. Burton, Waggeries.

6. In arch., the Ionic volute.—Alpine horn, a long trumpet used by the Swiss mountaineers for signaling and for musical effects.—Amalthea's horn, the cornucopia, or horn of plenty.

With fruits, and flowers from Amalthea's horn.
Milton, P. R., ii. 356.

At the horn†, put out of the protection of the law; proclaimed an outlaw. Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 354, note. [Slang.]—Bass horn, a large deep horn, once used in military bands.—English horn, a tenor oboe. See oboe.—French horn, the orchestral horn. See def. 4 (c).—Horn for the thumb†, a kind of horn thimble worn by pickpockets on the thumb to support the edge of the knife in cutting out purses.

I have your name, now I remember me, in my book of horners; horns for the thumb, you know how.
Middleton and Dekker, Roaring Girl, v. 1.

Horn of plenty, or cornucopia, in classical myth., the horn of the goat Amalthea by which the infant Zeus was suckled, broken off by him and endowed with the quality of becoming filled with whatever its possessor might wish for; hence, in representation, a goat's horn as a symbol of plenty or abundance in general.—Horn-of-plenty grass, an Oriental grass, Cornucopiæ cucullatum.—In a horn, not at all: a humorous expression of doubt or denial: as, he will do it—in a horn (that is, will not do it). Sometimes, in provincial English use, extended to in a horn when the devil is blind. [Colloq. or slang.]—Sax horn. See saxhorn.—To blow the buck's horn†. See *buck*1.—To come out at the little end of the horn, to come off ill from any encounter or experience; come to grief: used especially of one who completely fails in a boastful or pretentious undertaking. [Colloq.]—To pull or draw in one's horns, to repress one's ardor, or restrain one's pride: in allusion to the snail's habit of withdrawing its feelers when startled.—To put to the horn, in old Scots law, to denounce as a rebel; outlaw for not appearing in the court of summons. This was done by a messenger-at-arms, who proceeded to the cross at Edinburgh, and among other formalities gave three blasts with a horn, by which the person was understood to be proclaimed rebel to the king for contempt of his authority.—To take the bull by the horns. See *bull*1.—Valve-horn, a musical horn ★with valves for altering the pitch of particular tones.

horn (hôrn), v. t. [< horn, n.] 1. To furnish with horns.—2†. To cause to wear "horns" as the mark of a cuckold; cuckold. [Low.]

Vol. I not repent me of my late disguise.
Mos. If you can horn him, sir, you need not.
B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 2.

The moon embraces her shepherd;
And the queen of love her warrior;
While the first does horn
The stars of the morn,
And the second the heavenly farrier.
Tom o' Bedlam.

3. To give the shape of a horn to.—4. To treat to a charivari, or mock serenade of tin horns, etc. See horning, 2. [Local, U. S.]—5. To adjust (the frames of a ship) in process of construction so that they shall be exactly at right angles with the line of the keel.

hornaget, n. [< horn + -age, after the equiv. F. cornage, < L. cornu (= E. horn) + -age.] A quantity of corn formerly given yearly to the lord of the manor for every ox worked in the plow on lands within his jurisdiction. Cotgrave, under droict.

horn-band (hôrn'band), n. A band of trumpeters.—Russian horn-band, a band of musicians each one of whom plays upon a horn a single note only of the scale. The horns vary in length from 12 feet to 9 inches, according to the pitch of the note, and to play the chromatic scale through a compass of 3 octaves requires 37 players. This method of performing music was invented, with a suitable system of notation, by J. A. Maresch, a Bohemian domiciled in Russia, who gave his first performance before the imperial court in 1755. His method has been preserved in Russia down to the present time. It admits of the performance with precision of somewhat complicated music, including runs, trills, and other embellishments, but the artistic value of the result is necessarily small.

horn-bar (hôrn'bär), n. The cross-bar of a carriage, or the gearing supporting the fore-spring stays.

hornbeak (hôrn'bēk), n. The garfish: same as horn-eel, 2.

hornbeam (hôrn'bēm), n. A small tree belonging to the genus Carpinus, of the family Betulaceæ. The American hornbeam, also called blue beech, water-beech, and ironwood, is C. Caroliniana. It is a shrub or small tree, from ten to twenty feet high, with very heavy, hard, close-grained wood, which is sometimes used in making carpenters' tools, handles, etc. The European hornbeam, C. Betulus, is also a small tree, much planted in England. The wood makes a fine elastic tip for a fishing-rod, and is also used for agricultural implements, mallets, cogs of wheels, etc. Also called yoke-elm, hardbeam, and horn-beech. See cut under Carpinus.

With thee, where Easna's horn-beam grove
Its foliage o'er me interwove, Along the lonely path I've stray'd.
J. Scott, Ode to Leisure.

horn-beast† (hôrn'bēst), n. An animal with horns; a horned beast.

Here we have no temple but the wood, no assembly but horn-beasts. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 3.

horn-beech (hôrn'bēch), n. Same as hornbeam.

hornbill (hôrn'bil), n. A large non-passerine ★bird of the family Bucerotidæ: so called from the horny casque, in some cases of enormous size, which surmounts the bill. The bill is itself very large, like that of a toucan, on which account the hornbills have been associated with the toucans; they must be classed, however, with the kingfishers and hoopoes, notwithstanding the slightness of their superficial resemblance to these birds. There are two groups of hornbills, the tree-hornbills and ground-hornbills. The latter, which constitute the genus Bucorvus, have the casque quite hollow and in some cases open in front. One of the largest of the tree-hornbills is the rhinoceros hornbill, Buceros rhinoceros, having a bill nearly a foot in length, and surmounted by a horn nearly as large. It inhabits Sumatra. The concave-casqued hornbill of Asia is B. bicornis. A Philippine species is B. hydrocorax. African hornbills are chiefly of the genera Tockus, as T. erythrorhynchus, and Bycanistes, as B. buccinator; the ground-hornbills are also exclusively African. All these singular birds are for the most part frugivorous, and some of them are known to have the curious habit of imprisoning the female in the hole in which she lays her eggs, by stopping up the entrance, leaving room only to pass in food to her during her confinement.

hornblende (hôrn'blend), n. [< G. hornblende, < horn, = E. horn, + blende, > E. blende: see blende.] A common mineral, crystallizing in the monoclinic system with a prismatic angle of 124½°. Parallel to this, the fundamental prism, it has perfect cleavage. It occurs usually in massive forms, varying in structure from compact to columnar and fibrous, with the fibers parallel or curved, and also, but less often, lamellar. In composition it varies widely, from the white tremolite, a silicate of calcium and magnesium, to the green actinolite, which contains also more or less iron, and to the dark-green, brown, and black varieties, pargasite and common hornblende, which contain alumina as well as lime, magnesia, and iron; manganese is also present in some varieties, and less commonly sodium and potassium. Asbestos, mountain-cork, and mountain-leather are included here, and nephrite or jade is a tough, compact variety. Hornblende is a constituent of many crystalline rocks, as syenite, diorite, hornblende schist, some kinds of trachyte, andesite, etc. The name amphibole is often used as the general term to include all the varieties. The hornblende or amphibole group of minerals includes also the related orthorhombic species anthophyllite, and the monoclinic arfvedsonite, crocidolite, glaucophane, etc. In geology, hornblende or hornblendic is often prefixed to names of rocks to indicate the accidental presence in greater or less quantity of that mineral, in addition to the other ingredients which the rock usually contains. Hornblende is a frequent result of the metamorphism of other minerals, especially of augite.—Hornblende andesite. See andesite.—Hornblende basalt, a variety of feldspar basalt containing a notable amount of hornblende which in thin sections of the rock has a strong brown color. This hornblende is often present in large crystals.—Hornblende gabbro, a variety of gabbro in which the diallage is more or less replaced by hornblende.—Hornblende rock, a rock consisting chiefly of black or dark-green hornblende, but often interlaminated with feldspar, quartz, or mica. Also called amphibolite. The same rock when it has a schistose character is called hornblende slate or hornblende schist.—Labrador hornblende. See hypersthene.

hornblendic (hôrn-blen'dik), a. [< hornblende + -ic.] Containing hornblende; resembling hornblende.—Hornblendic granite. Same as hornblende ★granite. See granite, 1.

horn-blower (hôrn'blō″ėr), n. [< ME. hornblowere*, earlier hornblawere, < AS. hornblāwere, < horn, horn, + blāwere, blower.] One who blows a horn; a trumpeter.

Hornbook.

The Horn-blower [at Ripon] winds a horn every morning at nine o'clock, before the mayor's door and at the town cross.
Municip. Corp. Reports, 1835, p. 1710.

hornbook (hôrn'bůk), n. 1. A leaf or page, usually one containing the alphabet, the nine digits, and the Lord's Prayer, covered with transparent horn and fixed in a frame with a handle: formerly used in teaching children to read.

He teaches boys the horn-book. Shak., L. L. L., v. 1.

To Master John the English Maid
A Horn-book gives of Ginger-bread;
And that the Child may learn the better,
As he can name, he eats the Letter.
Prior, Alma, ii.

Hence—2. A book containing the first principles of any science or branch of knowledge; a primer.

horn-bug (hôrn'bug), n. A very common North American beetle, Passalus cornutus, of the family Lucanidæ, of large size, elongate form, and shining black color with pitch-black legs, the elytra sulcate with regularly impressed lines of punctures, and the head armed with a stout curved horn. Its whitish larva, found in decaying stumps and logs, has the third pair of legs rudimentary, but the two anterior pairs are well developed. Riley, 4th Mo. Ent. Rep., p. 139.

horn-card (hôrn'kärd), n. A transparent plate of horn graduated for use on charts, either as a protractor or for meteorological purposes, to represent the direction of the wind in a cyclone. Smyth.

horn-coot (hôrn'köt), n. The long-eared owl, Asio otus. [Local, Eng.]

horn-core (hôrn'kōr), n. The core of a horn; a projection or process of the frontal bone on which the corneous substance of a horn is supported and molded. It is true bone, of which the horny substance forms only a sheath.

The horns of the Bovidæ consist of permanent, conical, usually curved, bony processes, into which air-cells continued from the frontal sinuses often extend, called horn-cores, ensheathed in a case of true horn.
W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 431.

horn-cuirass (hôrn'kwē-ras″), n. A coat of fence made of scales of horn stitched to a garment of leather or stuff. See scale-armor.

horn-distemper (hôrn'dis-tem″pėr), n. A disease of cattle affecting the internal substance or core of the horn.

horn-drum (hôrn'drum), n. A wheel having curved partitions which separate it into sections, used for raising water. E. H. Knight.

horned (hôrnd), a. [< ME. horned (with restored vowel), < AS. hyrned (with mutated vowel) (= OHG. gi-hurnet, MHG. ge-hürnet, G. ge-hörnt = Dan. hornet; = L. cornutus, > E. cornute, q. v.); as horn + -ed[2].] Furnished with a horn or horns, or something resembling a horn in its nature, use, position, or appearance: as, horned cattle; a horned lizard; the horned moon.

In that Desert ben many wylde men, that ben hidouse to loken on: for thei ben horned.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 274.

O, that I were
Upon the hill of Basan, to outroar
The horned herd! Shak., A. and C., iii. 11.

The dim and hornèd moon hung low. Shelley, Alastor.

Specifically—(a) In ornith., having feathers on the head projecting like horns: as, the horned owl; a horned grebe. (b) In entom., having one or more large horn-like projections. See cut under horn-bug. (c†) Mitered. Halliwell. (d) In her., having horns: an epithet used when their tincture is different from that of the rest of the creature.—Horned beetle, frog, grebe, hog, horse, lark, owl, pheasant, poppy, pout, ray, screamer, etc. See the nouns.—Horned syllogism. See syllogism and dilemma, 1.—Horned toad, viper, etc. See the nouns.—Horned wavey, in her. See wavey.

hornedness (hôrnd'nes or hôr'ned-nes), n. The state of being horned.

The antient Druids had their superstitious Rites at the Changes of the Moon. The Hornedness of the New Moon is still faintly considered by the vulgar as an Omen with Regard to the Weather.
Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 380.

horn-eel (hôrn'ēl), n. 1. The larger sand-lance. [Prov. Eng.]—2. The garfish, Belone vulgaris: so called from its elongated body and produced jaws. [Prov. Irish.]

hornel (hôr'nel), n. [Reduced form of horn-eel.] The horn-eel. [Prov. Eng.]

hornen† (hôr'nen), a. [ME. hornen (with restored vowel), < AS. hyrnen (= OHG. hurnin, MHG. hürnen, hornin, G. hörnern), of horn, < horn, horn: see horn and -en[2].] Of horn.

In vois of the hornene trumpe.
Wyclif, Ps. xcvii. 6 (Oxf.).

horner (hôr'nėr), n. [< ME. hornere, hornare (= MD. MLG. horener), a trumpeter; < horn + -er[1].] 1. One who blows a horn; a horn-player; a trumpeter.—2. One who works or deals in horn.

Even the horns of cattle are prohibited to be exported; and the two insignificant trades of the horner and comb-maker enjoy, in this respect, a monopoly against the graziers. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, iv. 8.

3†. One who horns or cuckolds. [Low.]—4. In old Scots law, one who had been put to the horn, or publicly denounced and proscribed; an outlaw. [Rare or obsolete in all uses.]

horneress†, n. A female horn-maker. Palsgrave.

Horner's method of approximation. See approximation.

hornet (hôr'net), n. [< ME. hornet* (with restored vowel; not found), < AS. hyrnet, hyrnete, hyrnette, hyrnetu (with mutated vowel), earliest instance hurnitu (in a gloss, "crabro, waefs [wasp] vel hurnitu"), = MLG. hornte, hornetse = OHG. hornuz, hornaz, MHG. hornuz, horniz, G. horniss; G. dial. dim. hornissel = MD. hornsel, horsel, hursel (Kilian), D. horzel, a hornet; appar. < AS. OHG., etc., horn, with the same formative that appears in another deriv. from the same ult. root, namely, AS. heor-ot, heor-t, E. hart = OHG. hiruz, G. hirsch (see hart[1] and horn), the ref. being to the hornet's horns or antennæ, or to the buzzing sound it makes; cf. MLG. horener, a hornet, also a trumpeter, 'horner,' OLG. "horn-beron, crabrones," hornets, lit. 'horn-bearers,' i. e. (perhaps) 'trumpeters,' = AS. horn-bora, tr. L. cornicen, a trumpeter. The connection with horn is further shown by OFries. horen-bie, a hornet (Kilian), lit. a 'horn-bee,' horen-toren, a wasp (Kilian), LG. hornke, a hornet: cf. hornken, a little horn; cf. G. dial. hornech, and E. dial. hornicle, a hornet. But this connection may have originated in popular etymology; and the word may be really cognate with L. crabro (for crasro* (?); cf. L. tenebræ as related to Skt. tamisrā: see dim), a hornet, and with the Slavic, etc., forms: OBulg. sršsha, a wasp, sršsheni, a hornet, = Bohem. srch, srsheň, srshaň = Pol. szerszeń = Russ. shershene, etc., a hornet; OPruss. sirsilis, hornet, = Lith. shirshlīs, shirshū, a wasp; cf. Bohem. srsheti, buzz. Observe that wasp also has cognate forms in L., Slav., Lith., etc.] 1. An insect of the wasp family, of the genus Vespa, much larger and stronger than wasps of other species, and capable of inflicting a more severe and painful sting. Hornets congregate in a cellular nest formed of a substance resembling coarse paper, elaborated from leaves and particles of wood. The nest is sometimes pendent, and sometimes placed in a hollow tree. The European hornet, V. crabro, and the American hornet, or yellow-jacket, V. maculata, are similar in character and habit. The name is often used for any large or formidable wasp, especially one whose sting is exceptionally painful.

American Hornet (Vespa maculata), natural size.

He's like a hornet now, he hums and buzzes
Nothing but blood and horror.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, iv. 4.

Who seem a swarm of Hornets buzzing out Among their Foes, and humming round about,
To spet their spight against their Enemies,
With poysonie Darts, in noses, brows, and eyes.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Decay.

2. Figuratively, a person who annoys by frequent and persistent petty attacks.

More than one sultan, hoping to rid themselves of the annoyance, fitted out expeditions against the island with the design of crushing the hornets in their nest. Prescott.

To bring a nest of hornets about one's ears, to stir up enemies against one's self; bring upon one's self a swarm of troubles or vexations.

Hornie, n. See Horny.

hornify (hôr'ni-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. hornified, ppr. hornifying. [< horn + -i-fy: see -fy.] 1. To make horny or of the consistence of horn.

A wrought-iron stalk is partly encased in a tube of vulcanite, or hornified India-rubber.
Dredge's Electric Illumination, I., App., p. lxxxii.

2†. To cuckold. [Low.]

This versifying my wife has hornified me.
Beau. and Fl., Four Plays in One.

★ horning (hôr'ning), n. [Verbal n. of horn, v.] 1. The appearance of the crescent moon.

They account . . . from the horning [of the moon], which is the cause why they set up in their steeples a crescent.
J. Gregory, Posthuma, p. 168.

2. A mock serenade with tin horns and other discordant instruments, performed either in humorous congratulation, as of a newly married couple, or as a manifestation of public disapproval, as of some obnoxious person. [Local, U. S.]

A few moments after the ceremony a gun was heard outside—the signal for the horning, without which in that region no wedding would be thought complete.
Examiner and Chronicle.

3. Public proclamation by the blowing of a horn; specifically, same as letters of horning. [Scotch.]—Letters of horning, in Scots law, a process issued under the signet, after a debt has been judicially established, directing a messenger to charge the debtor to pay within a specified time, under pain of being declared rebel, with a warrant also to seize movables, etc. See caption.

hornisht (hôr'nish), a. [< horn + -ish[1].] Somewhat like horn; horny.

Temperance, as if it were of a hornish composure, is too hard for the flesh. Sir M. Sandys, Essays (1634), p. 21.

hornito (ôr-nē'tō), n. [Sp., dim. of horno, an oven, kiln, furnace: see horno.] In geol., a low oven-shaped mound, common in the volcanic districts of South America, usually emitting from its sides and summit hot smoke and other vapors. Hornitos are only from 5 to 10 feet high, and according to Humboldt are not eruptive cones, but mere intumescences on the fields and sides of the larger volcanos. Also called horno.

In every direction [in the lava desert in Iceland] there are innumerable hornitos, seemingly formed originally of a variety of strands of the fiery ooze twisted into all sorts of fantastic shapes, the outer surface suggestive of a tangle of intertwisted snakes of inordinate thickness.
Nature, XXX. 564.

hornkecke†, n. The garfish, Belone belone. Palsgrave.

horn-lead (hôrn'led), n. Lead chlorid: so called by the old chemists because it assumes a horny appearance in fusing. See phosgenite.

hornless (hôrn'les), a. [< horn + -less.] Having no horns.

The cattle of the highlands of Scotland are exceedingly small, and many of them, males as well as females, are hornless. Pennant, Brit. Zoöl., The Ox.

Heaps of ruin, hornless unicorns . . .
And shatter'd talbots, which had left the stones Raw that they fell from. Tennyson, Holy Grail.

hornlessness (hôrn'les-nes), n. The state of being destitute of horns.

Herodotus's opinion as to the cause of hornlessness has been accepted by many writers down to modern times.
Amer. Naturalist, XXI. 897.

hornlet (hôrn'let), n. [< horn + -let.] A little horn or projection.

Wings . . . embracing the keel and the hornlets of the awning. Sir W. Jones, Select Indian Plants, No. 60.

horn-machine (hôrn'ma-shēn″), n. A machine for sewing on shoe-soles: so called because the shoe is placed on a horn.

> Master George Heriot . . . paused at the shop-door of . . . the ancient horologer, and having caused Tunstall, who was in attendance, to adjust his watch by the real time, he desired to speak with his master.
> Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, v.

horologia, n. Plural of horologion and horologium.

horologic (hor-ō-loj'ik), a. [< L. horologicus, < Gr. ὡρολογικός, telling the hour, < ὡρολόγος: see horologe.] 1. Pertaining to a horologe or to horology.—2. In bot., opening and closing at certain hours: said of flowers.

horological (hor-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< horologic + -al.] Same as horologic.

horologiographer (hor-ō-lō-ji-og'ra-fėr), n. [As horologiography + -er[1].] A describer or a maker of clocks or dials. Also horographer.

horologiographic (hor-ō-lō″ji-ō-graf'ik), a. [As horologiography + -ic.] Pertaining to horologiography.

horologiography (hor-ō-lō-ji-og'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ὡρολόγιον, a horologe, + γραφία, < γράφειν, write, describe.] 1. An account of instruments that mark the hour of the day.—2. The art of constructing timepieces, as clocks, watches, and dials; horography.

horologion (hor-ō-lō'ji-on), n.; pl. horologia (-ä). Same as horology, 2.

> The Horologion . . . contains the daily hours of prayer, so far as respects their immoveable portions.
> J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 848.

horologist (hō-rol'ō-jist), n. [As horology + -ist.] One versed in horology; a maker of time-pieces.

> As the horologist, with interjected finger, arrests the beating of the clock. R. L. Stevenson, Markheim.

horologium (hor-ō-lō'ji-um), n.; pl. horologia (-ä). [L., < Gr. ὡρολόγιον, an instrument for telling the hour, in ML. and MGr. a clock: see horologe.] 1. A clock.

> It may be inferred from various allusions to horologia, and to their striking spontaneously, in the 12th century, that genuine clocks existed then, though there is no surviving description of any one until the 13th century, when it appears that a horologium was sent by the sultan of Egypt in 1232 to the Emperor Frederick II.
> Encyc. Brit., VI. 13.

2. Same as horology, 2.—3. [cap.] A southern constellation of twelve stars, inserted by Lacaille east of Eridanus. Its brightest star is of the fourth magnitude.—Horologium Floræ, or Flora's clock. (a) A horologe composed of different growing flowers, in which the hour is supposed to be shown by the successive opening and closing of certain developed buds. Thus, in England, the flower of the chicory opens from 4 to 5 A. M.; of the dandelion, from 5 to 6; of the pimpernel, after 8; and of the tiger-lily, from 11 to 12. (b) In bot., a table of the hours at which the flowers of certain plants open and close in a given locality.

horologue (hor'ō-log), n. [Var. of horologe, with sense taken from horoscope.] The horoscope; destiny as indicated by the stars.

Seven days after the birth of Meleager the Fates told the horologue of the child. Quarterly Rev., CLXIII. 212.

horology (hō-rol'ō-ji), n.; pl. horologies (-jiz). [< L. horologium, < Gr. ὡρολόγιον, a horologe: see horologe. In def. 3 used as if < Gr. *ὡρολογία, < ὡρολόγος, telling the hour: see horologe and -ology.] 1†. A contrivance for measuring time; a timepiece.

He betaketh himselfe to the refreshing of his bodie, which is noted and set downe by the Greek letters of the diall (wherewith the Romane horologies were marked, as ours be with their numerall letters), whereby the time is described. Holinshed, Descrip. of England, vii.

2. In the Gr. Ch., an office-book containing the offices for the canonical hours, from matins (mesonycticon) to complin (apodeipnon) inclusive, as well as antiphons, hymns, etc., from the menology and other books, some short occasional offices, and several canons of odes. Generally the calendar is prefixed. In its complete form the book is called The Great Horology. On the whole, the horology corresponds to the Western breviary, with considerable differences, however, both of contents and arrangement. Also called horologion or horologium.

3. The science of measuring time, or the principles and art of constructing, regulating, testing, etc., instruments for indicating divisions of time, as sun-dials, clocks, and watches.

horometer (hō-rom'o-tėr), n. [= F. horomètre = Pg. horometro, < Gr. ὥρα, an hour, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring time.

horometrical (hor-ō-met'ri-kal), a. [As horometry + -ic-al.] Belonging to horometry.

horometry (hō-rom'e-tri), n. [= F. horométrie = Pg. horometria = It. orometria; as horometer + *-y*3.] The art of determining the exact error of a timepiece by observation; also, more generally, the art of keeping time, or of knowing the time of day.

Horometrie is an art mathematicall which demonstrateth how at all times appointed the precise usuall denomination of time may be known for any place assigned. Dee, Preface to Euclid (1580).

It is, I confess, no easie wonder how the horometry of antiquity discovered not this artifice (of wheels). Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 18.

horopter (hō-rop'tėr), n. [< Gr. ὅρος, a boundary (see horizon), + ὀπτήρ, one who looks, < ὀπτεσθαι, see: see optic.] The locus of all the points in space which in any position of the eyes form images falling upon corresponding points of the two retinæ.

The horopter, being the only line or surface of single vision, has to be transferred to a remoter position by the outward or divergent movement of the eyes in order to effect the combination of homonymous images, and to a nearer position by the inward or convergent movement in order to combine heteronymous images. J. H. Hyslop, Mind, XIII. 505.

horopteric (hor-op-ter'ik), a. [< horopter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the horopter.

Objects lying in a horizontal circle passing through the point of sight and the centers of the eyes are usually supposed to be seen single. . . . This circle has been called the horopteric circle of Müller. Le Conte, Sight, p. 99.

horoscope (hor'ō-skōp), n. [< F. horoscope = Sp. Pg. horoscopo = It. oroscopo = L. horoscopium, < Gr. ὡροσκοπεῖον, also ὡροσκόπιον, a nativity, horoscope (also a horologe), < ὡροσκόπος, one who observes the hour of a birth, also a horoscope, < ὥρα, hour, + σκοπεῖν, view: see hour and scope, skeptic.] 1. In astrol.: (a) That part of the ecliptic which is on the eastern horizon at the instant of a nativity.

May stormless stars control thy horoscope. Lowell, Bon Voyage.

(b) The figure or diagram of the twelve houses of heaven, with the positions of the planets, used by astrologers in calculating nativities and in answering horary questions.

Let the twelve houses of the horoscope
Be lodged with fortitudes and fortunates,
To make you blessed in your designs.
T. Tomkis (?), Albumazar, vii. 147.

"There lay," said Sir Edward, "on his table his horoscope and nativity calculated, with some writing under it." Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 18, 1673.

2. A kind of planisphere, invented by John of Padua.—3. A table of the length of the days and nights at different places.—To cast a horoscope, to calculate the part of the ecliptic which is on the eastern horizon at the time of a nativity or at the moment of asking a horary question, and thence to erect a figure of the heavens, with a view to considering the influences of the stars upon human affairs or upon the destiny of a person.

The court astrologers, according to custom, cast the horoscope of the infant, but were seized with fear and trembling as they regarded it. Irving, Granada, p. 15.

horoscoper (hor'ō-skō-pėr), n. One versed in horoscopy. Also horoscopist.

The astrologers, horoscopers, and other such, are pleas'd to honour themselves with the title of Mathematicians. Shaftesbury, Advice to an Author, iii. § 1.

horoscopic (hor-ō-skop'ik), a. [< L. horoscopicus, < horoscopium, horoscope: see horoscope.] Relating to horoscopy.

horoscopical (hor-ō-skop'i-kal), a. [< horoscopic + -al.] Same as horoscopic.

horoscopist (hō-ros'kō-pist), n. [< horoscope + -ist.] Same as horoscoper.

horoscopy (hō-ros'kō-pi), n. [< Gr. ὡροσκοπία, casting a nativity, < ὡροσκόπος, one who observes the hour of birth, a horoscope: see horoscope.] 1. The art or practice of foretelling future events by observation of the stars and planets. —2. The aspect of the heavens at the time of a child's birth.

The aspect of the stars at their nativity . . . was called horoscopy, and esteemed a part of judicial astrology. Hobbes, Of Man, xii.

horowt, a. Same as hory.

Horra goose. See goose.

horrendoust (ho-ren'dus), a. [= OF. horrende = It. orrendo, < L. horrendus, fearful, terrible, ger. of horrere, tremble with fright: see horrent, horrid.] Fearful; frightful.

Horrendous earthquakes. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., Hist. Boston.

horrent (hor'ent), a. [< L. horren(t-)s, bristly, shaggy, rough, ppr. of horrere, bristle, shake, shiver, tremble with cold or with fear, be terrified, dread: cf. Skt. √ harsh, bristle. Cf. Hordeum.] 1. Standing erect, as bristles; covered with bristling points; bristling.

Him round
A globe of fiery seraphim inclosed,
With bright imblazonry and horrent arms.
Milton, P. L., ii. 513.

2. Horrible; abhorring. Bailey.

horribile dictu (ho-rib'i-lē dik'tū). [L.: horribile, neut. of horribilis, horrible; dictu, abl. supine of dicere, say, tell: see diction.] Horrible to relate; dreadful to say.

horrible (hor'i-bl), a. [< ME. horrible, horrable, orrible, < OF. horrible, orible = Pr. horrible, orrible = Sp. horrible = Pg. horrivel = It. orribile, < L. horribilis, terrible, fearful, dreadful, < horrere, be terrified, fear, dread: see horrent.] 1. Exciting or tending to excite horror; dreadful; terrible: as, a horrible sight; horrible cruelty; a horrible story.

All aboute hym all full of horryble peple and blacke whiche had speres and swerdes. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 159.

A dungeon horrible on all sides round. Milton, P. L., i. 61.

2. Hideous; shocking; extremely repulsive: as, horrible deformity; a horrible smell.

But surely we see yt his [Solomon's] continual wealth made him fal, first into such wanton folie, on multiplying wiues to an horrible number, contrary to the commandment of God. Sir T. More, Cumfort against Tribulation (1573), fol. 38.

The Devil had afflicted Job with horrible diseases, and might therefore afflict others. Lecky, Rationalism, I. 92.

=Syn. Execrable, Abominable, etc. (see nefarious); frightful, fearful, horrid, awful, revolting.

horribleness (hor'i-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being horrible; dreadfulness; hideousness; shocking repulsiveness.

horribletet, n. [ME., also orriblite, < OF. horriblete, orriblete, etc., < horrible, horrible: see horrible and -ty.] Something horrible.

Ful many an other orriblite

Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 20.

2. Fitted to excite horror; dreadful; shocking: as, a horrid spectacle.

Give colour to my pale cheek with thy blood,
That we the horrider may seem to those Which chance to find us. Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2.

I myself will be
The priest, and boldly do those horrid rites
You shake to think on. Fletcher, Sea Voyage, v. 4.

What say ye then to fair Sir Percivale,
And of the horrid foulness that he wrought?
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

3. Very bad or offensive; abominable; execrable.

My Lord Chief Justice Keeling hath laid the constable by the heels to answer it next Sessions: which is a horrid shame. Pepys, Diary, Oct. 23, 1668.

About the middle of November we began to work on our Ship's bottom, which we found very much eaten with the Worm: For this is a horrid place for Worms. Dampier, Voyages, I. 362.

Already I your tears survey,
Already hear the horrid things they say.
Pope, R. of the L., iv. 108.

[Horrid and horrible, originally distinct in meaning in their Latin forms, but sometimes used interchangeably by later writers, are now almost entirely synonymous in English; but horrid commonly has a milder or less positive force than horrible.] = Syn. 2. Horrible, frightful, awful, appalling, harrowing, dire, revolting.

horridly (hor'id-li), adv. In a horrid or dreadful manner; shockingly.

He [Talleyrand] looks horridly old, but seems vigorous enough and alive to everything. Greville, Memoirs, March 9, 1830.

horridness (hor'id-nes), n. The quality of being horrid, abominable, or shocking.

He did not by any pretended prerogative excuse or protect them, but delivered them up into the hands of that justice which the horridness of the fact did undoubtedly demerit. Ludlow, Memoirs, III. 333.

horrific (ho-rif'ik), a. [= F. horrifique = Sp. horrifico = Pg. horrifico, < L. horrificus, that causes terror, < horrere, be terrified, fear (see horrent, horrid), + facere, cause, make.] Causing horror.

Let . . . nothing ghastly or horrific be supposed. Is. Taylor.

I have a vivid memory of a tendency in the Sienese painters to the more horrific facts of Scripture and legend. Howells, The Century, XXX. 671.

horrification (hor'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [< horrify (see -fy) + -ation.] The act of horrifying; anything that causes horror.

As the old woman and her miserable blue light went on before us, I could almost have thought of Sir Bertrand or of some German horrifications. Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, iii.

horrify (hor'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. horrified, ppr. horrifying. [< L. horrificare, make rough or terrible, cause terror, < horrificus, causing terror: see horrific.] To cause to feel horror; strike or impress with horror.

★ I was horrified at the notion. T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

horripilate (ho-rip'i-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. horripilated, ppr. horripilating. [Formed from horripilation.] To produce horripilation in; cause to shrink or creep, as flesh. [Recent and rare.]

Flesh made to creep by the utterance of such words as poets utter—flesh moved by an Idea, flesh horripilated by a Thought! L. Hearn, The Porcelain God.

horripilation (hor'i-pi-lā'shon), n. [= F. horripilation = Sp. horripilación = Pg. horripilação = It. orripilazione, < LL. horripilatio(n-), < horripilare, bristle with hairs, be shaggy, < L. horrere, bristle, + pilus, hair.] A contraction of the cutaneous muscles, producing the erection of the hairs and the condition known as cutis anserina or goose-flesh. It is accompanied by a kind of creeping sensation in the skin, and may be produced by cold, peculiar and sudden emotions, such as fear, or certain nervous affections.

A wonderful desire and love impel men from distant regions to visit the holy spot, and the first sight of the Kaabah causes awe and fear, horripilation and tears. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 388.

horrisonant (ho-ris'ō-nant), a. [< horrison-ous + -ant, after sonant.] Same as horrisonous. [Rare.]

If it had been necessary to exact implicit and profound belief by mysterious and horrisonant terms. Southey, The Doctor, lxxxvi.

horrisonous (ho-ris'ō-nus), a. [< L. horrisonus, that makes a horrid sound, < horrere, be terrible, horrid, + sonus, a sound, sonare, make a sound.] Sounding dreadfully; uttering or emitting a terrible sound. [Rare.]

horror (hor'ọr), n. [Formerly also horrour; = F. horreur = Sp. Pg. horror = It. orrore, < L. horror, a bristling, a shaking, trembling as with cold or fear, terror, < horrere, bristle, shake, be terrified: see horrent and horrid.] 1†. A bristling or ruffling, as of the surface of water; a rippling.

Such fresh horror as you see driven through the wrinkled waves. Chapman.

2. A shivering or shuddering, as in the cold fit which precedes a fever, usually accompanied with contraction and roughening of the skin; a rigor. [Rare.]

When lo! a spectre rose, whose index-hand Held forth the virtue of the dreadful wand. . . .
O'er every vein a shuddering horror runs;
Eton and Winton shake through all their sons.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 143.

A sudden horror chill
Ran through each nerve, and thrilled in every vein.
Addison, Æneid, iii.

3. A painful emotion of fear or abhorrence; a shuddering with terror or loathing; the feeling inspired by something frightful or shocking.

But if we think of being turn'd to naught,
A trembling horror in our souls we find.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of Soul, xxx.

Horrour is that very strong and painful emotion which is excited by the view or contemplation of something peculiarly atrocious in the conduct of another; by some vice which exceeds the usual extravagance of vice; enormities that surpass the bounds of common depravity.
T. Cogan, The Passions, I. ii. § 3.

I met her gray eyes glazed
With sudden horror most unspeakable.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 309.

4. Shrinking dread; great dislike or repugnance: as, to hold publicity in horror; to have a horror of falsehood.

Sympathising with an English reader's pious horror for unpronounceable Asiatic names, I will try to avoid them as much as possible. Nineteenth Century, XXII. 471.

5. That which excites horror or terror; that which causes gloom or dread: as, the horrors of war; a place of horrors.

Ye haue encreased the fault of your vile rebellion with the horrour of bloudshed. Sir J. Cheke, Hurt of Sedition.

I saw myself the lambent easy light
Gild the brown horror, and dispel the night.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, ii. 659.

Intervals of a groping twilight alternated with spells of utter blackness; and it was impossible to trace the reason of these changes in the flying horror of the sky.
R. L. Stevenson, Merry Men.

The novel bristles with nonsense and unnecessary horrors. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 146.

The horrors. (a) Extreme depression; the blues. [Colloq.]

As you promise our stay shall be short, if I don't die of the horrors, I shall certainly try to make the agreeable.
Miss Ferrier, Marriage, iii.

(b) Delirium tremens. [Colloq.]

He do take a drop too much at times, and then he has the horrors. Trollope, Dr. Thorne, xl.

horror-stricken, horror-struck (hor′or-strik′n, -struk), a. Struck with horror; horrified.

horry (hor′i), a. See hory.

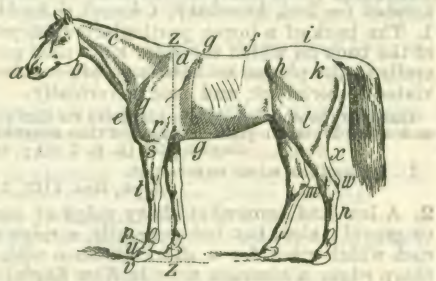
horst†, n. An obsolete spelling of horse[1], in Middle English both singular and plural.

hors concours (hôr kôṅ-kör′). [F., out of competition: hors, out; concours, competition.] Not entered for competition: said of a work of art in an exhibition.



hors de combat (hôr dẽ koṅ-bä′). [F., out of the fight: hors, prep., out, beyond, < L. foris, out of doors, without (see forisfamiliate, forfeit); de, < L. de, of; combat, fight: see combat.] Out of the fight; disabled; unable to take further part in the struggle.

hors-d'œuvre (hôr′dêvr′), n. [F., lit. outside (the) work: hors, out; de, of (see hors de combat); œuvre, work (see ure).] In gastronomy, something served not as a part of a course; a relish, as radishes, pickles, etc.

Tried all hors-d'œuvres, all liqueurs defined, Judicious drank, and greatly daring dined.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 317.

★ horse[1] (hôrs), n. [< ME. hors (pl. hors and horses), < AS. hors (pl. hors) = OS. hors, hros (hross-) = OFries. hors, hars = D. ros = OHG. hros, ros, MHG. ros (ross-), G. ross (> It. rozza = Pr. rossa = F. rosse, a jade) = Icel. hross, hors = Sw. Dan. dial. hors, a horse. Root uncertain; some connect the word with AS. horsc = MHG. rosch, swift, referring both to a root shown in L. currere (for cursere*?), run: see current[1]. The Indo-Eur. word for 'horse' is that represented by Skt. açva = Gr. ἵππος = L. equus = AS. eoh, etc.: see Equus. The ordinary Teut. terms outside of E. are D. paard, G. pferd (see palfrey); Sw. häst, Dan. hest (see henchman); the Rom. words are F. cheval, Sp. caballo, etc. (see cheval, caple[1], cavalry, etc.).]

1. A solidungulate perissodactyl mammal of the family Equidæ and genus Equus; E. caballus. It has a flowing mane and tail, comparatively small erect ears, comparatively large rounded hoofs, shapely head, arched neck, a callosity on the inner side of the hind leg below the hock, in addition to one on the fore leg above the so-called "knee," and a peculiar voice called a "neigh." These are the principal distinctive characters of the existing horses, of whatever variety, in comparison with the asses and zebras, which are commonly placed in the same genus (Equus). The horse has no distinctive coloration, but is never conspicuously striped in any regular pattern, and seldom shows even the dorsal and shoulder stripe characteristic of the ass, though there is often an indication of this marking in horses which have reverted to a feral state and tend to assume a dun color. The horse is now known only as a domesticated and artificially bred animal, though in both North and South America, in Australia, and in some parts of Asia the descendants of domesticated ancestors run wild in troops. The native country of the horse and the period of its subjection to man are unknown. Animals congeneric with the present horse, if not conspecific, have left their remains with those of the mammoth and other extinct animals in the bone-caves of both the old and new worlds, but the genus Equus appears not to have been fully established before the close of the Pliocene. The evolution of the modern forms has been traced back through the whole Tertiary period, by the discovery of such genera as Hipparion and Pliohippus of the Pliocene, Anchitherium, Miohippus, and Mesohippus of the Miocene, and Orohippus and Eohippus of the Eocene. In the course of this evolutionary series is observed a very gradual and unbroken geologic pedigree, going back to a small animal, not larger than a fox, with several separate toes on each foot. The size has steadily increased, and other progressive modifications, especially of the limbs, have resulted in the existing horse in all its numberless artificial breeds, races, and strains, combining in various degrees the qualities of size, strength, speed, and bottom. Two breeds—namely, the large, powerful, black breed of Flanders, and the Arabian—have contributed more than all others to develop the present varieties. The former laid the foundation of size, strength, and vigor for draft-horses and for those formerly used in war; while, when mailed armor was laid aside, and the horse began to be used for the chase, the latter conferred the speed and endurance which distinguish the hunter. The ladies' palfrey is largely derived from the Spanish genet, a small, beautiful, fleet variety of the Moorish barb. The race-horse has less of Flemish and more of Arabian blood. Other leading varieties are the Suffolk Punch and Clydesdale, both chiefly of Flemish blood, and best for draft and agriculture; and several varieties of ponies, as Galloway, Shetland, etc. Carriage, riding, and other horses combine the above breeds in varying degrees, as speed, endurance, strength, or size, etc., may be required. Horses are said to have "blood" or "breeding" in proportion as they have a greater or less strain of Arab blood. The wild horse of Tatary is called a tarpan, that of northern Africa a koomrah, and that of America a mustang, the last being descended from imported Spanish parents. The male of the horse is a stallion; when gelded, a gelding; the female is a mare; the young, a foal—if a male, a colt, if a female, a filly. The colt and filly become "of age" when the "corner-nippers" (outer incisors) attain functional development. The age of the horse may be determined by the marks on the front teeth, which change with the wearing down of the crowns by use. When the mark disappears, as it generally does in the eighth or ninth year, the horse is "aged." The period of gestation is eleven months, and foals are generally dropped in the spring. Horses vary greatly in size, some standing more than twice as high as others. Very small horses are called ponies, as those bred in Shetland.

A-noon he made tweyne of his sones for to make hem redy and sette hem on two swifte horse.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 525.

Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? Job xxxix. 19.

The horse that guide the golden eye of heaven,
And blow the morning from their nostrils. Marlowe.

In the earliest period, the Horse seems to have been the favourite animal for sacrifice; there is no doubt that before the introduction of Christianity its flesh was universally eaten. Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 47.

2. pl. In zoöl., the horse family, or Equidæ; the species of the genus Equus and related genera. These include all the existing asses of the restricted genus Asinus, and the quagga, dauw, and zebra, of the restricted genus Hippotigris, together with all the extinct forms of the Tertiary period which, however different from the modern horse, are connected closely by intermediate links. See Equidæ.

3. The male of the horse kind, in distinction from the female or mare; a stallion or gelding.

horse-post (hôrs'pōst), n. A post to which ★horses are hitched; a hitching-post.

horse-power (hôrs'pou″ėr), n. 1. The power of a horse or its equivalent: hence, a unit for the measurement of the rate at which a prime motor works. Several values have been assigned to this unit, but the one which prevails at the present time in England and America is Watt's horse-power, which is defined as 550 foot-pounds per second. The horse-power is equivalent to 33,000 foot-pounds per minute; 746×10^7 ergs per second; 75.9 kilogram-meters per second or 745.650 watts. The British horse-power, as above, is 1.0139 times the corresponding French unit of power known as the force de cheval. The horse-power is a purely arbitrary unit. The average power of animals in foot-pounds per minute working for periods of eight hours has been estimated to be as follows: horse, 21000; ox, 12000; mule, 10000; man (in rowing) 4000; man (turning handle) 2600. An ordinary man can, by great effort, as in the act of running up-stairs, exert for a short time about one horse-power. The real power of a horse is about three quarters of a horse-power. Abbreviated H. P.

2. A machine for converting the weight or direct pull of a horse into power useful in moving machinery. Such machines are either treadmills or circular sweeps.—Electrical horse-power, the power of an electric generator or motor producing or consuming 745.650 watts.—Indicated horse-power, the work, expressed in horse-power, performed per minute by steam, air, or other gas upon the piston of an engine, in the computation of which the mean effective pressure per square inch of piston is taken from an indicator diagram. See indicator. Also called true, actual, real, or dynamic horse-power.—Nominal, calculated, or commercial horse-power, horse-power calculated from the area of the piston, on assumption of prevalent pressures and speeds. Though the commercial horse-power is arbitrarily called calculated horse-power, it is easy to calculate the true horse-power by the principles of thermodynamics when the volume or weight and pressure of the steam, air, or gas used for each piston-stroke and the number of strokes per minute are given.

horsepox (hôrs'poks), n. A pustular disease of horses: said to produce cowpox in cows.

horse-purslane (hôrs'pėrs″lān), n. A plant, Trianthema monogyna, a native of Jamaica.

horse-sense (hôrs'sens'), n. A crude, instinctive kind of common sense, independent of instruction or experience; a coarse, robust, and conspicuous form of shrewdness often found in ignorant and rude persons; plain, practical good sense.

> He was a plain man; his sympathies were with the people; he had what is roughly known as horse-sense, and he was homely. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 133.

> Happily, the latent horse-sense of the American people may be relied on, in the end, to abate the nuisance. New Eng. Jour. of Education, XIX. 377.

★horseshoe (hôrs'shö), n. [< ME. horscho (for hors-scho, var. horsissho, horsis sho — Prompt. Parv.); < horse[1] + shoe.] 1. A shoe for a horse, consisting commonly of a narrow plate of iron bent into a form somewhat resembling the letter U, so as to accommodate itself to the shape of the horse's foot. Its parts are the toe, the two heels, the quarters between the toe and the heels, the calks, or projections from the lower part of each heel, the clip, a kind of claw, usually at the upper edge of the toe, for protecting the hoof and assisting in keeping the shoe in place, and the fullering, or crease in the lower face, in which the nail-holes, usually eight, are punched. The horseshoe, in its most primitive form, is of great antiquity. An old and very popular superstition, almost universally prevalent among peasantry, ascribes to the horseshoe (especially to one which has been found in the road by chance) the power of barring the passage of witches. For this purpose the shoe is nailed to the door or the threshold.

> To be thrown into the Thames, and cooled, glowing hot, in that surge, like a horse-shoe. Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 5.

> Your wife's a witch, man; you should nail a horse-shoe on your chamber-door. Scott, Redgauntlet, ch. xi.

> Nailing of horse-shoes [to thresholds] seems to have been practised as well to keep witches in as to keep them out. Hone's Year-Book, p. 953.

2. Anything shaped like a horseshoe. Specifically—(a) A loop-like bend in a river. (b) In fort., a small round or oval work with a parapet. (c) A movable support in a lathe, for regulating the gearing and speed of the screw which works the slide.

3. In zoöl.: (a) A horseshoe-crab.

> I don't want my wreck to be washed up on one of the beaches in company with devil's-aprons, bladder-weeds, dead horse-shoes, etc. Holmes, Autocrat, p. 171.

(b) A bivalve mollusk, Lutraria elliptica. Also called clump.—4. pl. The game of quoits, in which horseshoes are often used for pitching. —Horseshoe arch. See arch[1], 2.—Horseshoe clamp, magnet, etc. See the nouns.

horseshoe (hôrs'shö), v. t.; pret. and pp. horseshoed, ppr. horseshoeing. [< horseshoe, n.] 1. To provide with horseshoes, or shape like a horseshoe.

> Sinclair Lithgow, horse-shoeing smith,
> Warks up this close wi' a' his pith.
> Blacksmith's sign in Scotland.

2. In arch., to carry inward at the imposts, as an arch, so as to bring it approximately to the form of a horseshoe.

> There is at Takt-i-Gero a Sassanian arch of nearly the same age and equally classical in design, which is, like this one, horseshoed to the extent of one-tenth of its diameter. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 391.

horseshoe-anvil (hôrs'shö-an″vil), n. A form of anvil which corresponds in shape and size to the hoof of a horse, and has shanks which permit the adjustment of the hoof in the socket-hole for convenience in working.

horseshoe-bat (hôrs'shö-bat), n. An old-world bat of the family Rhinolophidæ; any rhinolophid having the nose-leaf more or less horseshoe-shaped. The name applies especially to two European species, Rhinolophus ferrum-equinum and R. hipposideros, both of which occur in England, and there represent the subfamily Rhinolophinæ. Another horseshoe-bat is the Indian and Chinese Phyllorhina armigera, which is a representative of the Phyllorhininæ, the other subfamily of the rhinolophids. The term is loosely extended to some other phyllostomine or leaf-nosed bats.

horseshoe-crab (hôrs'shö-krab), n. A merostome of the family Limulidæ, as Limulus polyphemus or L. moluccanus: so called from its shape. Also called horseshoe, horsefoot, horse-crab, horsefoot-crab, and king-crab. See Limulus.

hosanna (hō-zan'ȧ), interj. and n. [Formerly also osanna; < LL. osanna (var. ozanna, ossanna, ossana), ML. also hosanna, < Gr. ὡσαννά, ὡσαννά (var. ὡσανά, ὁσσανά), repr. Heb. hōshī'āh nnā, lit. save, I pray (or we pray), < hōshia', save, a stem of yāsha', be large (cf. Jesus, from the same stem), + nā, a particle denoting entreaty.] An exclamation praying God for deliverance, or an acclamation or ascription of praise to God. This exclamation originated from the Hebrew words rendered "Save now" in Ps. cxviii. 25, a psalm forming part of the Hallel used at the Passover. The form hosanna is recorded in Mat. xxi. 9, 15, and in the parallel passages (Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13), as used by the multitude in acclamation to Christ entering Jerusalem in triumph on the Sunday before his crucifixion, with the additions "to the son of David" and "in the highest." It has been in liturgical use from very early times. It appears in the Clementine Liturgy, in the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and in the liturgical directions of the book called The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles. In both the Western and the principal Eastern liturgies it follows the Sanctus. The English Prayer-Book of 1549 retained the hosanna (osanna) in the first "hosanna in excelsis," but altered the second to "Glory be to thee, O Lord, in the highest." (See Luke xix. 38.) Later revisions omitted the first hosanna and changed 'in the highest' to 'most High.' See Benedictus.

> Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest. Mark xi. 10.

> Loud hosannas fill'd
> The eternal regions. Milton, P. L., iii. 348.

G. hose, breeches, = Icel. hosa, a covering for the leg between the knee and ankle, a kind of gaiter, = Dan. hose, pl. hoser, hose, stockings. The Rom. forms, OF. hose, OSp. huesa, OPg. osa, It. uosa, ML. hosa, osa, are of G. origin; W. and Corn. hos are from E.] 1. Originally, a garment covering the legs and the waist, worn by men. The hose of the middle ages generally covered the person from the waist to the toes; they were secured to the upper garment by points or some similar device. At times the covering of one leg and side of the body was of different material and color from that of the other side. In the sixteenth century the leg-coverings were divided into two parts, and the word hose was applied rather to the breeches, the covering of the lower part of the leg and foot being called the stocking or nether-stock.

Departynge of hire hoses in whit and reed.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Doublet and hose ought to show itself courageous to petticoat. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 4.

And he had on yet all this while a paire of hosen of Deere-skinnes with the haire on.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 433.

Towards the close of the [sixteenth] century the hose of that period also became "breeches"; and so, in process of time, the old and long-used word "hose" came to be retained only as an equivalent for "stockings."
Encyc. Brit., VI. 472.

2. In present use (as either singular or plural), covering for the feet and lower part of the legs; stockings. Short stockings, not reaching to the knee, are distinctively called half-hose or socks, or, rarely, ankle-hose.

The belted plaid and tartan hose
Did ne'er more graceful limbs disclose.
Scott, L. of the L., ii. 25.

The article of attire in which he took chief pleasure was hose; and the better to show the gay colors of these, he wore low-cut shoes of the finest calf-skin, turned up at the toes. The Century, XXXV. 950.

3. A flexible tube or pipe for conveying a fluid to a required point, as water for the service of a fire-engine, for watering a garden, etc. Hose of the larger kinds for such uses, to which the term is usually restricted, is made chiefly of leather, gutta-percha, cotton, or india-rubber. Smaller tubing, as for gas in a drop-light, for acoustic instruments, etc., to which the name may also be applied, is made of many different materials and in various ways.

It was now towards sunset on Saturday, and the inhabitants were washing the fronts of the houses with the hose.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 148.

hospitable (hos′pi-ta-bl), a. [< OF. hospitable = Sp. hospedable = It. ospitabile, < ML. as if hospitabilis*, < hospitare, receive as a guest: see hospitate, host[2], v., and cf. hospital.] 1. Kind and cordial toward strangers or guests; freely affording shelter and food; extending a generous welcome to visitors.

We were received with open arms by all our old friends; and when they do open their arms, there are no people so kind and so hospitable as the Scotch.
Lady Holland, Sidney Smith, viii.

A king
Whom all men rate as kind and hospitable.
Tennyson, Princess, i.

2. Characteristic of or affording generous or friendly entertainment; indicating or devoted to hospitality: as, hospitable manners; a hospitable table.

His hospitable gate
The richer and the poor stood open to receive.
Drayton, Polyolbion.

For harbour at a thousand doors they knock'd,
Not one of all the thousand but was lock'd;
At last an hospitable house they found.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii.

It was really delightful to see the old squire seated in his hereditary elbow chair, by the hospitable fireside of his ancestors. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 247.

3. Figuratively, generous in mind; free in receiving and entertaining that which is presented to the mind: as, hospitable to new ideas.

It [the religion of the Greeks] was hospitable to novelties and was composite in character.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 86.

hospitableness (hos′pi-ta-bl-nes), n. The quality of being hospitable; hospitality.

His [Abraham's] benignity to strangers, and hospitableness, is remarkable among all his deeds of goodness.
Barrow, Works, I. xxxi.

hospitably (hos′pi-ta-bli), adv. In a hospitable manner; with generous and cordial entertainment.

The former liveth as piously and hospitably as the other.
Swift.

hospitage† (hos′pi-tāj), n. [= Pg. hospedagem, < ML. hospitagium, accom. form of hospitaticum, a right of exacting entertainment, hospitality, < hospitare, receive as a guest: see hospitate and host[2].] Hospitality.

Of vile ungentlenesse, or hospitages breach.
Spenser, F. Q., III. x. 6.

★ hospital (hos′pi-tal), a. and n. [I. a. < OF. hospital = Sp. hospital = It. ospitale, a., < L. hospitalis, of or relating to a guest or host; as a noun, a guest; < hospes (hospit-), a host, a guest: see host[2], n. Hence hospitality. II. n. < ME. hospital, hospitalle (also abbr. spitel, early mod. E. spital, spittle: see spittle[2]), < OF. hospital, a hospital, mod. F. hôpital = Pr. Sp. Pg. hospital = It. ospedale = G. Dan., etc., hospital, < ML. hospitale, a large house, a palace, an inn, neut. sing. (cf. L. hospitalia, apartments for guests, neut. pl.) of L. hospitalis, of or relating to a guest or host: see I. The same word, contracted, appears in E. as hostel (of ME. origin) and hotel (of recent introduction); a fourth form appears in the obs. spittle[2].] I.† a. Hospitable.

I am to be a guest to this hospital maid [Venice] a good while yet. Howell, Letters, I. i. 35.

II. n. 1†. A place of shelter or entertainment; an inn.

Whenas they spide a goodly castle, plaste
Foreby a river in a pleasaunt dale;
Which choosing for that evenings hospitale,
They thither marcht. Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 10.

2. An institution or establishment for dispensing hospitality or caring for the needy; an asylum for shelter or maintenance. This old sense still appears in the term foundling hospital, and in the names of some institutions in Great Britain founded for either the care or education, or both, of persons needing help: as, Greenwich Hospital for retired seamen, a national institution; Christ's Hospital for the free education of boys, founded by the corporation of London, chartered in 1553, and often called the Blue-Coat school, from the uniform of its pupils.

Whan the kynge Amaunt was deed, the kynge Bohors cleped hys companye, and seide that gladly wolde he ther make an hospitall where-ynne a man myght euer after serue oure lorde god for the soule of hym as longe as the worlde dured. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 369.

The Foundling Hospital of London was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1739. Encyc. Brit., IX. 483.

3. Now, specifically, an establishment or institution for the care of the sick or wounded, or of such as require medical or surgical treatment. Hospitals are either public or private, free or paying, or both combined, and general or special with respect to the kinds of disease or classes of persons admitted. In ancient Greece the sanctuaries of Æsculapius included establishments closely akin to medieval and modern hospitals.

A Roman lady named Fabiola, in the fourth century, founded at Rome, as an act of penance, the first public hospital, and the charity planted by that woman's hand overspread the world. Lecky, European Morals, II. 85.

At the end of the last and beginning of this century, fever hospitals were generally called "houses of recovery."
Encyc. Brit., XII. 302.

Convalescent hospital. See convalescent.—Cottage hospital, a small and inexpensive establishment, simply organized, and designed to provide hospital accommodation and care in a small and isolated community. The first cottage hospital in England was established at Cranleigh in 1859, and was merely an ordinary cottage.—Cottage-hospital system a system of which the aim is to provide small and isolated communities with inexpensive, serviceable, and easily managed hospitals.—General hospital, a hospital to which cases of all kinds were formerly admitted. Under later provisions and regulations, however, certain classes of disease may be excluded from a general hospital, such as smallpox, venereal disease, dementia, etc.—Hospital gangrene. See gangrene.—Hospital Saturday. See Hospital Sunday.—Hospital steward. (a) A non-commissioned staff-officer in the United States army who compounds prescriptions, administers medicine, and has general charge, under the direction of an army surgeon, of the sick and of hospital property. Hospital stewards are graded as first, second, and third class, and are permanently attached to the medical corps. (b) In the navy, the designation formerly given to the apothecary.—Hospital Sunday, a Sunday set apart annually in all the churches, chapels, etc., for a special collection of contributions for the benefit of the public hospitals. In London the first Hospital Sunday was observed in June, 1873, in response to an invitation sent out to the churches from the Mansion House, and since that time the collection has always been made in June. In New York Hospital Sunday, appointed for a similar collection for the hospitals, falls on the last Sunday in the year. The money so collected is distributed among the hospitals in proportion to the number of free patients, without regard to sect or creed. On the preceding Saturday, known as Hospital Saturday, similar collections are made in the synagogues, and also in many places of business. In London, on Hospital Saturday, in addition to the collections made at places of business, factories, etc., ladies take charge of boxes in the streets.—Lock hospital, a general name in Great Britain for a hospital for the treatment of venereal diseases. (Thomas, Med. Dict.) The origin of the name is indicated in a bequest made in 1452 by Ralph Holland, a merchant tailor, of twenty shillings to the "Lock lazar-house, outside St. George's gate." This "Lock lazar-house," which was so called as being specially isolated or quarantined, afterward became an infirmary for syphilitic cases, and seems to have given the name to hospitals of that class.—Magdalen hospital, a house or establishment into which prostitutes are received with a view to their reformation; a female reformatory. Also called Magdalen asylum.—Marine hospital, a hospital established at a seaport or elsewhere for the relief of sick seamen. In the United States a marine hospital for merchant seamen, under the charge of the supervising surgeon-general, an officer of the Treasury Department, has been established at nearly every large seaport and at several stations on the lakes and rivers.—Maternity hospital, a hospital for the reception of women about to give birth to children.—Naval hospital, in the United States, a hospital for the medical care of officers and men of the navy, under charge of naval surgeons.—Special hospital, one of a class of hospitals set apart for the reception and treatment of cases in certain special diseases, or in special emergencies, as smallpox, ophthalmic, and lying-in hospitals, hospitals for incurables, etc.

The Order of the Dutch knights, commonly called the Hospitalaries of Ierusalem. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 144.

hospitaler (hos'pi-tal-ėr), n. [Also written hospitaller; < ME. hospitaler, hospiteler, hospitler, < OF. hospitalier = Pr. hospitaleir, espitaler = Sp. hospitalero = Pg. hospitaleiro, < ML. hospitalarius, < hospitale, a hospital: see hospital and -er[1].] One devoted to the care of the sick or the needy in a hospital or hospitals; specifically, a member of one of the medieval communities of laymen, monks, knights, etc., who bound themselves to observe certain monastic rules, generally the rule of Augustine, and to devote themselves to the care of the poor and the sick in hospitals. The principal order was the Brethren of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, founded for pilgrims at Jerusalem about A. D. 1048. They are best known as the Knights Hospitalers, or Knights of St. John (in full, Knights Hospitalers of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem), and in history as Knights of Rhodes or of Malta. (See below.) The Teutonic Knights developed in a similar way. Other orders were the Hospitalers of Burgos, Hospital Brethren of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Toward the Southe, a 200 Paas, is the gret Hospitalle of Seynt John; of the whiche the Hospitleres hadde here foundacioun. Mandeville, Travels, p. 81.

Amalric, leaving Cyprus under the administration of the Hospitallers, transferred his court to Acre. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 171.

Order of the Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, a body of military monks, which took its origin from an earlier community, not military in character, under whose auspices a hospital and a church had been founded in Jerusalem. Its military organization was perfected in the twelfth century. After the retaking of Jerusalem by the Moslems, these knights defended Acre in vain, took shelter in Cyprus, and in the fourteenth century occupied the island of Rhodes. In 1522 the island of Rhodes was seized by the Turks, and the knights, after some wanderings, were given possession of the island of Malta, the government of which island they administered until it was occupied by Napoleon Bonaparte in 1798. The badge of the order was the cross of eight points, without any central disk, and consisting in fact of four barbed arrow-heads meeting at their points, the well-known Maltese cross. This is modified in modern times, with slight differences for the different nations in which branches of the order have survived. At different times the order has been called officially Knights of Rhodes and Knights of Malta. It maintains to the present day a certain independent existence; but until 1879 there was no grand master, and the order was governed by a council residing at Rome. The appointment of a new grand master in 1879 may denote some change in the constitution of the order. That branch of the order called the bailiwick of Brandenburg was revived and recognized as a separate order by the King of Prussia in 1852.

hospital-fever (hos'pi-tal-fē'vėr), n. 1. Typhus fever.—2. Pyemia.

hospitalism (hos'pi-tal-izm), n. [< hospital + -ism.] A depressed state of mind and body observed in the attendants and other officials consequent upon long exposure to hospital influences; formerly, also the liability to erysipelas and hospital gangrene incurred by patients in infected hospital wards.

The sick require protection against the evils which they themselves create, and which collectively are known as hospitalism. The Nation, Dec. 16, 1875, p. 388, note.

hospitality (hos-pi-tal'i-ti), n.; pl. hospitalities (-tiz). [< F. hospitalité = Pr. hospitalitat = Sp. hospitalidad = Pg. hospitalidade = It. ospitalità, < L. hospitalita(t-)s, hospitality, < hospitalis, hospitable: see hospital, a.] The act or practice of one who is hospitable; reception and entertainment of strangers or guests without reward, or with liberality and kindness.

Julius Cæsar made his abode here, who kept very honourable hospitality in this Citie. Coryat, Crudities, I. 126.

I could not but take particular notice of the lesson of hospitality the governor taught . . . by distributing about to all the Arabs of the good fare they had brought, even before he had served himself. Pococke, Description of the East, I. 48.

Lifting the ceremonious three-cornered hat, and offering the fugacious hospitalities of the snuff-box. Lowell, Cambridge Thirty Years Ago.

The open-handed spirit, frank and blithe, hospital-ship (hos'pi-tal-ship), n. A vessel fitted up for the care of sick or wounded seamen, or of patients taken from a ship in quarantine.
Of ancient hospitality. Lowell, Under the Willows.

hospitate† (hos'pi-tāt), v. [< L. hospitari, dep., be a guest, ML. hospitare, act or entertain as a guest, < hospes (hospit-), a guest, a host: see host[2], n. and v.] I. trans. To receive with hospitality; treat as a guest.

II. intrans. To be the recipient of hospitality; reside or lodge as a guest.

That always chooses an empty shell, and this hospitates with the living animal in the same shell. N. Grew, Museum.

hospitia, n. Plural of hospitium.

hospiticide† (hos-pit'i-sīd), n. [< LL. hospiticīda, < L. hospes (hospit-), a guest (see host[2]), + -cīda, killer, < cædere, kill.] One who murders his guests. Bailey, 1731.

hospitious† (hos-pish'us), a. [< L. hospitium, hospitality (see hospice), + E. -ous.] Hospitable.

We glory in th' hospitious rites our grandsires did commend. Chapman, Iliad, vi.

Ouse, having Ouleney past, . . .
Through those rich fields doth run, till lastly, in her pride,
The shire's hospitious town she in her course divide. Drayton, Polyolbion, xxii. 24.

hospitium (hos-pish'i-um), n.; pl. hospitia (-ă). [L.: see hospice.] 1. An inn or a place for the reception of strangers; a hospice.—2. In Eng. law, an inn of court.

hospodar (hos'pō-dăr), n. [< Rum. hospodar, Upper Sorbian hospodar, Lower Sorbian gospodar, Pol. hospodar (borrowed), prop. gospodarz, Serv. gospodar, Russ. gospodare, OBulg. gospodare, etc., lord, master, < OBulg. Russ. gospode, Bulg. gospod, Serv. gospod, etc., lord, the Lord, God, = L. hospes (hospit-), host: see host[2].] A title of dignity formerly borne by the vassal princes of Moldavia and Wallachia, in earlier times by the princes of Lithuania and the kings of Poland, and still used as a title (gosudar) of the Czar of Russia.

host[1] (hōst), n. [< ME. host, ost, < OF. host = Pr. ost = Sp. hoste, hueste = Pg. hoste = It. oste, a host, an army, < L. hostis, OL. fostis, a stranger, foreigner, enemy, pl. hostes, the enemy, hence in ML. sing. hostis, an army; = OBulg. Russ., etc., goste, a guest, visitor, stranger, = AS. gæst, E. guest, etc.: see guest[1]. Hence host[2] (a contracted compound), and possibly host[3], q. v.] 1. An army; a multitude of men organized for war.

In that See was Pharao drowned and alle his Hoost that he ladde. Mandeville, Travels, p. 57.

A host so great as covered all the field. Dryden.

He strove with the heathen host in vain,
And fell with the flower of his people slain.
Bryant, Rizpah.

2. Any great number or multitude.

Evening approached; but, oh! what hosts of foes
Were never to behold that evening close!
Addison, The Campaign.

Arm'd himself in panoply complete
Of heav'nly temper, [he] furnishes with arms . . .
The sacramental host of God's elect!
Cowper, Task, ii. 349.

Host of heaven, the heavenly bodies; the sun, moon, and stars.

Lest thou, . . . when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldest be driven to worship them. Deut. iv. 19.

The golden sun,
The planets, all the infinite host of heaven.
Bryant, Thanatopsis.

Lord of hosts, a title of Jehovah, found more than 260 times in the Old Testament; sometimes also Lord God of hosts, or God of hosts. The term hosts in this phrase includes all the myriads of angels who people the celestial spheres, and includes the celestial spheres themselves. It is probably given with reference to the idolatrous worship of Jehovah, and as a means of asserting His universal supremacy.

host[1] (hōst), v. i. [< host[1], n. Cf. hosting, n.] To assemble or move as an army. [Rare.]

The prince of Wales was ready in the field with hys people, and advanced forward with them towarde his enimies, an hosting pace. Holinshed.

With scanty force, where should he lift the steel,
While hosting foes immeasurably wheel?
J. Barlow, Vision of Columbus, vi.

★ host[2] (hōst), n. [< ME. host, ost, hoste, oste, < OF. hoste, F. hôte = Pr. hoste, oste = Sp. It. oste, a host, innkeeper, < L. hospes (hospit-), fem. hospita, an entertainer, a host, also a sojourner, visitor, guest; hence, a foreigner, a stranger; prob. contr. of orig. hostipes* (hostipit-*), lit. 'guest-master,' one who receives guests or strangers (= OBulg. Russ., etc., gospode, lord, master, the Lord: see hospodar), < hostis, a stranger (see host[1]), + -pes (-pit-), connected with potis, powerful, orig. lord, = Gr. -πότης in δεσπότης, lord, master (see despot), = Skt. pati, master, governor, lord: see potent, posse. From this L. hospes are derived also E. hospitable, hospital, hospitate, hostel, hostler, ostler, hostelry, hotel, spittle[2], etc.] 1. One who receives and entertains another in his own house, whether gratuitously or for pay; an entertainer; specifically, the landlord of a public house or inn: the correlative of guest[1].

Greet chiere made oure host us everichon. Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 747.

Homer never entertained either guests or hosts with long speeches till the mouth of hunger be stopped. Sir P. Sidney.

London hath receiv'd,
Like a kind host, the dauphin and his powers.
Shak., K. John, v. 1.

2. An animal or a plant in relation to a parasite habitually dwelling in or upon it. The correlative term, in either case, is guest. See commensal, guest[1], 4, inquiline, parasite, hyperparasite. (a) In botany the term is used chiefly with reference to parasitic fungi, such as Uredinales, Ustilaginaceæ, Erysiphaceæ, etc. Some species of fungi are confined to a single host, some are found on a number of related plants, while others pass through the different stages of their development on very unlike hosts, as, for example, the heterœcious rusts. The term is also applied to the plants upon which the dodder (Cuscuta), the mistletoe, and others are parasitic.

That curious phenomenon included under the term heterœcism, which consists in the growth of one generation of a parasitic Fungus upon one host, and the development of another generation upon a different host. Encyc. Brit., IV. 162.

(b) In zoölogy the term is a very general and comprehensive one, since almost all animals are infested, or liable to infestation, by parasites of some kind; and some parasites are themselves hosts of others.

Almost every group of birds becomes the host of some specific or varietal form [of parasites] with distinct adaptations. Nature, XXX. 621.

3. In mineral., a mineral which incloses another. —4†. One who is entertained by another as his guest; a guest.

Than he made his hoste the beste chere that he myght, and made hem richely be serued at ese in a feire chambre. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 684.

5†. [With sense of L. hospitium: see hospice.] An inn; a lodging.

Make rēdy to me an ooste or hous for to dwelle inne. Wyclif, Phil. 22 (Oxf.).

This mayden that was feire com to Bredigan, where-as the kynge soiourned, and was at hoste with a riche burgeys. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 171.

Your goods, that lay at host, sir, in the Centaur. Shak., C. of E., v. 1.

To reckon without (or formerly before) one's host, to count up the cost of one's entertainment without consulting the host or landlord (whose reckoning is likely to be higher, or at least more careful); hence, not to consider all the circumstances; to reach a conclusion on insufficient data, or without taking into account some important fact or facts.

But thei reckened before their host, and so payed more then their shotte came to. Hall, Henry VI., f. 49. (Halliwell.)

The old English proverb telleth us that "they that reckon without their host are to reckon twice"; and so it fared with this infatuated people. Heylin, Hist. Reformation, I. 93.

host[2]† (hōst), v. [< OF. hoster, oster, < L. hospitare, lodge, < hospes (hospit-), a host, a guest: see host[2], n. Cf. hospitate.] I. intrans. To lodge, as at an inn; receive entertainment; be a guest. [Rare.]

They say that God talks with him face to face, Hoasts at his house.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

Go, bear it to the Centaur, where we host.
Shak., C. of E., i. 2.

II. trans. To give entertainment to; receive as a guest.

Such was that Hag, unmeet to host such guests.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. viii. 27.

And caused hym to be hosted with a worshypfull man of that citie called Chremes. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 12.

host[3] (hōst), n. [< ME. host, hoste, hoost, oost, also hostie, < OF. hostie, F. hostie = Pr. Sp. Pg. hostia = It. ostia, a sacrifice or thing sacrificed, < L. hostia, OL. fostia, an animal sacrificed, a victim, sacrifice (in ML. applied to the consecrated bread), prob. < hostire (OL.), strike; cf. hasta, a spear: see hastate, and gad[1], goad[1].] 1†. An offering; a sacrifice.

Anon, said Isaac; Father, heer I see Knife, fire and faggot, ready instantly:
But wher's your Hoste?
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Fathers.

2. In the Western Ch.: (a) The sacramental victim in the eucharist; Christ offered under the species of bread and wine, or under either species separately. According to the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, not only is Christ as both God and Man in the sacrament of the eucharist and in every part of it, but the substances of bread and wine cease to exist after consecration. The outward acts of adoration are therefore not directed to bread and wine, but only to Christ; and the sacrament is accordingly to be worshiped with latria, the worship due to God only.

> The priests were singing, and the organ sounded,
> And then anon the great cathedral bell.
> It was the elevation of the Host.
> Longfellow, Spanish Student, i. 3.

(b) One of the pieces of bread used for consecration in the mass or eucharist; an altar-bread, oblate, or wafer. It is unleavened, small, thin, flat, circular, and generally stamped with a cross, IHS., the figure of the crucified Christ, or the Agnus Dei. The word is used both of the unconsecrated bread and of the sacrament under the form of bread. See altar-bread, oblate.

> After the consecration [in the Mozarabic missal] the host is broken into nine fragments, which are so arranged on the paten as to form a cross.
> Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 105.

Adoration of the Host, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the act of reverence or worship shown to the sacrament of the eucharist as Christ's body and blood; latria or divine worship rendered to Christ under the sacramental species, especially that of bread. The Host is adored immediately after consecration and at other times, as when taken by a priest to a sick person.—Blood of the Host. See bloody bread, under bloody.—Elevation of the Host. See elevation, 7.

host[3]†, v. t. [< host[3], n.] To administer the sacrament to. Nares.

> He fell sick and like to die, whereupon he was shriven and would have been hosted, and he durst not for fear of casting.
> Scogan's Jests, p. 27.

host[4] (hōst), n. Same as hoast. [Scotch.]

hostage[1] (hos'tāj), n. [< ME. hostage, ostage, < OF. hostage, ostage, mod. The initial h is unoriginal, and is due to simulation of L. hostis, enemy: see host[1].]

1. A person given or held as a pledge of or security for the performance of certain stipulations, as those of a treaty, or the satisfaction of certain demands.

> He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief.
> Bacon, Marriage and Single Life (ed. 1887).

> But the king had alienated them by his mistrust, and had confined the lord Strange, son of lord Stanley, as a hostage for his father's fidelity. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 362.

2. A thing given as a pledge. [Rare.]

> And hostage from the future took
> In trained thought and lore of book.
> Whittier, Snow-Bound.

hostage[1]†, v. t. [< hostage[1], n.] To give as a hostage.

> Nor is it likely now they would haue so hostaged their men, suffer the building of a Fort, and their women and children amongst them, had they intended any villainy.
> Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 90.

hostage[2]†, n. [< ME. hostage, ostage, < OF. hostage, ostage, houstage, lodging, < hoster, oster, lodge: see host[2], v.] An inn; a lodging.

Russ. Pol. suka, Hung. szuka, etc., a bitch. Root unknown.] 1. A dog; specifically, a dog of a breed or variety used in the chase, as in hunting the boar, the deer, the fox, the hare, or the otter. The principal breeds of dogs distinctively classed as hounds (sometimes considered as constituting a species, Canis sagax) are the beagle, bloodhound, buckhound, foxhound, greyhound, harrier, and staghound. (See these words.) Hounds commonly hunt by scent, and are for the most part used in numbers together, called packs, to run down and capture or kill the game. Many kinds of dogs are readily bred or trained for this purpose, as it is the mode of hunting most natural to wild dogs and wolves. In England hound without qualification means a foxhound: as, to follow the hounds.

He saw an hydous hwond dwell
Withinne that hows that was full fell;
Of that hond grette drede he had.
Visions of Tundale, p. 25.

Sleep! the deer is in his den;
Sleep! thy hounds are by thee lying.
Scott, L. of the L., i. (song).

2. A mean, contemptible fellow; a dastard; a poltroon: as, a low hound; a sly hound.

Thanne shal borel clerkes ben abasched to blame ȝow or to greue,
And carpen nouȝte as thei carpen now and calle ȝow doumbe houndes. Piers Plowman (B), x. 287.

3. Same as houndfish, 1.

The species both of Mustelus and of Rhinotriacis . . . share the name of hound, . . . doubtless due to their following their prey in packs. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 82.

4. The oldwife, or long-tailed duck, Harelda glacialis: so called from its gabble, likened to the cry of a pack of hounds. [Newfoundland.] —5. Naut., a projection at the masthead on either side, serving as a support for the trestle-trees of large or the rigging of smaller vessels. Also called hounding.—6. Either of two pieces of wood used in artillery-limbers to connect the splinter-bar and pole with the axle.—7. Either of a pair of side-bars or horizontal braces for reinforcing various parts of the running-gear of a vehicle.—Gabriel hounds, in English folk-lore, a name given to various sounds heard high in the air after dark and in the early morning, resembling the cry of a pack of hounds; in reality, the noise made by wild geese and curlews, but supposed to proceed from lost souls with which the angel Gabriel is hunting other souls. The sound is supposed to forebode trouble.—Hare and hounds. See hare[1].—Pack of hounds, a number of hounds bred and trained together for hunting. A regularly established pack of foxhounds is commonly maintained for the joint use and at the joint expense of the principal huntsmen of a district, under the charge of one of them called the "master of the hounds," who summons the association to a "meet" whenever a general hunt is intended.

If the wolves had been hounded by tigers.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

3. To pursue or harass as if with hounds: as, to hound one on to ruin.

I shall be hounded up and down the world;
Now every villain that is wretch enough
To take the price of blood dreams of my throat.
Otway, Caius Marius, iv. 2.

It is to be hounded off and shouted down.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 68.

4. To follow like a hound; track; trail.

It is no more but by following and as it were hounding nature in her wanderings, to be able to lead her afterwards to the same place again.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

To hound out, to set on; encourage to do injury to others. Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 350 (note). [Slang.]

hounder (houn'dėr), n. One who pursues game with hounds: as, a deer-hounder.

houndfish (hound'fish), n. [< ME. houndfisch, hund-fisch, -fyssh; < hound + fish[1]. Cf. dogfish.] 1. A shark of the genus Scylliorhinus and some similar species. See dogfish, 1. Also called hound.—2. A species of belonids belonging to the genus Tylosurus, such as T. raphidoma and T. acus.—3. The bluefish, Pomatomus saltatrix, formerly called blue houndfish in Massachusetts. See cut under bluefish.—4. The Spanish mackerel, Scomberomorus maculatus, formerly called speckled houndfish in Massachusetts.

Arthur (ed. Furnivall), l. 539.

Jesus saith unto her, Woman, . . . mine hour is not yet come. John ii. 4.

I cried, Waken, gude master,
For now is the hour and time.
Lord John (Child's Ballads, I. 136).

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike th' inevitable hour. Gray, Elegy.

Their regular hours stupefy me — not a fiddle nor a card after eleven! Sheridan, The Rivals, i. 1.

2. The time marked or indicated by a timepiece; the particular time of day: as, what is the hour? at what hour shall we meet?

Imo. What hour is it?
Lady. Almost midnight, madam.
Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 2.

3. The twenty-fourth part of a civil day, or the twelfth part of a natural day or night. This division of time was invented by the Babylonians. Until modern times the hour was commonly considered as the twelfth part of the interval from sunrise to sunset or from sunset to sunrise. Until some time in the eighteenth century mean time was not used for ordinary purposes. Thus the Italians began the day half an hour after sunset, and reckoned 24 hours in each day. Until watches came into common use, in the seventeenth century, the time of day was determined ordinarily by the altitude of the sun, as in the following extract from Palladius, where the length of the shadow of a staff 4 feet long placed vertically determines the hours of the day reckoned from sunrise. Abbreviated h.

With October Marche houres feet beth even
The first hath XXV. feet, XV Feet hath the seconde houre, the thirdde XI,
The fourthe hath VIII, and V up six sustene,
And six hath V. In VI, VII demene,
And so goo forth. X hath feet thries V.
XI goth with XXV blyve.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 139.

It is sixteen hours or two small days journey with a loaded caravan from Baalbeck to Damascus.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. 113.

I will eat
With all the passion of a twelve hours' fast.
Tennyson, Geraint.

4. pl. (a) Set times of prayer; the canonical hours (which see, under canonical). (b) The offices or services prescribed for the canonical hours, or a book containing them. See book of hours, below.—5. [cap.] In Gr. myth., one of the Horæ or Hours, the goddesses of the seasons and guardians of the gates of heaven. They were held especially to personify the agreeable characteristics of the seasons, were closely associated with the Graces, and were attached to the train of Aphrodite. In art and poetry they were represented as young and graceful, decked with flowers and jewels.

While universal Pan,
Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance, Led on the eternal spring. Milton, P. L., iv. 267.

At the eleventh hour. See eleventh.—Babylonian hour. (a) A twelfth part of a civil day. (b) The hour reckoned from sunrise as the beginning of the day.—Book of hours, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a book of devotion containing offices for private use especially during the canonical hours, in addition to those appointed in the breviary or portiforium: often called simply the hours. Many medieval books of hours are still preserved in manuscript, or printed, and ornamented with beautiful illuminations, paintings, etc. The most widely used of these among the laity as well as among ecclesiastics were the "Hours of the Blessed Virgin," or "Hours of Our Lady."—Canonical hours. See canonical.—Eight-hour law, a law limiting the day's work of certain classes of working men to eight hours. The United States Congress passed an eight-hour law in 1868, applying to government work, and most of the States have similar laws, usually providing for extra pay for extra time. Several States have laws fixing eight hours as the general limit of a day's work: the first was passed in California in 1887.—Equinoctial hour, a twenty-fourth part of a mean solar day, being the length of a temporary hour at the equinoxes.—Forty hours, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a continuous exposition of the eucharist for forty hours. See exposition of the sacrament, under exposition.—Hour angle. See angle[3].—Hours of prayer. Same as canonical hours (which see, under canonical).—In a good hour†, fortunately.

Whan Arthur saugh the swerde that so flambed, he preised it moche in his herte, and drough hym a litill vp hit to be-holde, and couevted it right sore, and thought that in goode houre were he born that it myght conquere.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 340.

Inequal hour†. See inequal.—Little hours, the canonical hours of prime, terce, sext, and none.—Morning hour, in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, the hour after the reading of the journal, set apart for reports, motions, etc., before the taking up of unfinished business.—Office hours. See office.—Sidereal hour, the twenty-fourth part of a sidereal day.—Solar hour, the twenty-fourth part of a solar day.—Temporary hours [Gr. ὧραι καιρικαί], among the Greeks, hours of varying length resulting from the practice of dividing the natural day and night each into twelve equal parts: so called because of their variation according to the season of the year.—Ten-hour law, a law fixing the length of an ordinary day's work at ten hours. Such a law exists in several States.—The small hours, the early hours of the morning, designated by small numbers, as one, two, etc.—Three hours, three hours' service, three hours' agony, a service held on Good Friday from noon to 3 P. M. in Roman Catholic and many Anglican churches, in commemoration of Christ's sufferings on the cross, the time answering to that recorded in Mat. xxvii. 45 (Mark xv. 33, Luke xxiii. 44).—To keep good hours, to be at home in good season; not to be abroad late, or after the usual hours of retiring to rest.

Cowper, Task, v. 404.

hour-circle (our'sėr″kl), n. In astron.: (a) Any great circle of the sphere which passes through the two poles: so called because the hour of the day is ascertained when the circle upon which the sun is for the time being is ascertained. (b) A circle upon an equatorial telescope lying parallel to the plane of the earth's equator, and graduated into hours and subdivisions of hours.

hour-glass (our'glȧs), n. and a. I. n. 1. An instrument for measuring time, consisting of a glass vessel constricted to a narrow passage in the middle, through which a quantity of sand, or sometimes of mercury, runs from the upper part into the lower in exactly an hour. At the end of the hour the glass may be reversed, when the sand will run back for another hour. Hour-glasses are now seldom used, though formerly very common. Similar instruments intended to mark shorter intervals are named accordingly, as a half-hour or a ten-minute glass. A three-minute glass, to boil eggs by, is called an egg-glass.

I should not see the sandy hour-glass run,
But I should think of shallows and of flats.
Shak., M. of V., i. 1.

Time, like a preacher in the days of the Puritans, turned the hour-glass on his high pulpit, the church belfry.
Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 5.

Pers. huri, pl. hūr, < Ar. hūriya, pl. hūr, a nymph of Paradise, lit. black-eyed, < ahwar, fem. hawrā, black-eyed.] Among the Mohammedans, a nymph of Paradise. In the Koran the houris are represented as beautiful virgins, endowed with unfading youth and immunity from all disease. Their company is to form the chief felicity of the faithful.

Or, thronging all one porch of Paradise,
A group of Houris bow'd to see
The dying Islamite, with hands and eyes
That said, We wait for thee.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

hour-line (our'līn), n. In astron., a line indicating the hour; a line on which the shadow of the gnomon falls at a given hour.

hourly (our'li), a. [< hour + -ly[1].] Happening or done every hour; occurring hour by hour; continuing from hour to hour; hence, frequent; often repeated.

Honour, riches, marriage-blessing,
Long continuance, and increasing,
Hourly joys be still upon you!
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1 (song).

We must live in hourly expectation of having those troops recalled. Swift.

hourly (our'li), adv. [< hour + -ly[2].] Every hour; hour by hour; frequently.

Great was their strife, which hourly was renewed.

housbondry†, n. An obsolete form of husbandry.

house[1] (hous), n.; pl. houses (hou'zez). [< ME. hous, hows, hus, < AS. hūs = OS. OFries. hūs = D. huis = MLG. hūs = OHG. MHG. hūs, G. haus = Icel. hūs = Dan. Sw. hus = Goth. hūs (only in comp. gud-hūs, house of God, temple); prob. connected with hut and hoard[1], and ult. from the root of hide[1], cover, conceal: see hide[1], hut, hoard[1].] 1. A building designed to be used as a place of residence, or of human occupation for any purpose: as, a dwelling-house; a banking-house; a house of worship; a public house. In law the word house, used for a dwelling-place, is sometimes interpreted as excluding and sometimes as including outbuildings.

It is right a feir Howe, and it is alle round, and highe, and covered with Leed, and it is well paved with white Marble. Mandeville, Travels, p. 81.

I rode to Papia or Pavia, a cite and universite, ther lyes Seynt Austyn, the grett Doctor, in a howse of Religion, of Chanons reguler, and ffryers Austyns.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 5.

He is for this bonnie lass,
To keep his house in order.
Catherine Johnstone (Child's Ballads, IV. 34).

Houses are built to live in, and not to look on; therefore, let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had. Bacon, Building (ed. 1887).

Hence—2. An abiding-place; an abode; a place or means of lodgment; a fixed shelter or investment: as, the hermit-crab carries its house on its back.

I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living. Job xxx. 23.

It is the curse of kings to be attended
By slaves that take their humours for a warrant
To break within the bloody house of life.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2.

According to M. Fol, who has studied the formation of the house [the mucilaginous cuticular investment] with great care, the Appendicularieæ have no proper test, and what I have described as the structureless gelatinous investment of the anterior part of the body is the commencement of the house. It increases, assumes a peculiar fibrous structure, and in the course of an hour, in a vigorous animal, it is separated as an envelope in which the whole body is capable of free movement.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 514.

3. A building used for some purpose other than human occupation: usually with a descriptive prefix: as, a cow-house; a ware*house;* a tool-house.

And of all thynges let the butterye, the celler, the kytchyn, the larder house, with all other houses of offyces, be kepte cleane. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 114.

4. The persons collectively who dwell together under one roof; a family; a household.

As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.
Josh. xxiv. 15.

My mother weeping, my father wailing, . . . and all our house in a great perplexity. Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 3.

5. A family regarded as consisting of ancestors, descendants, and kindred; a race of persons from one stock; a tribe; especially, a noble family or an illustrious race: as, the house of Hapsburg; the house of Hanover; the house of Israel or of Judah.

A patrician,
A man, I must confess, of no mean house.
B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2.

The coat-armour of every house was a precious inheritance, which descended, under definite limitations and with distinct differences, to every member of the family.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 471.

6. (a) A legislative body; usually, one of the divisions of the legislative branch of a government acting separately, or of any deliberative body divided into two chambers: as, the House of Lords or of Commons in the British Parliament; the House of Representatives in the United States Congress; the House of Bishops and the House of Delegates in the American Episcopal Church. The less numerous or higher in rank of the two bodies composing a bicameral legislature is commonly spoken of, though not officially designated, as the upper house, the other as the lower house. (b) [cap.] Specifically, in the United States, the lower house, or House of Representatives, the more numerous of the two bodies of the national legislature. The name is also given in some States to the corresponding body in the State legislature. See congress, 4.

The House, in addition to its legislative powers, has the sole power of impeachment. Calhoun, Works, I. 176.

7. The audience or attendance at a place of entertainment.

The self-complacent actor, when he views (Stealing a sidelong glance at a full house)
The slope of faces from the floor to roof
Relax'd into a universal grin.
Cowper, Task, iv. 201.

The whole house broke out into acclamations.
F. A. Kemble, Records of a Girlhood, Jan. 9, 1831.

8. In com., a firm or commercial establishment: as, the house of Jones Brothers.

Many a year went round before I was a partner in the house. Dickens, Great Expectations, lviii.

9. Chamber; room; specifically, in provincial English use, the ordinary sitting-room in a farm-house; in sulphuric-acid works, one of the chambers in which the acid is formed.

Like a pestilence, it doth infect
The houses of the brain.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 1.

10. In astrol., a twelfth part of the heavens as divided by great circles drawn through the north and south points of the horizon, in the same way as meridians pass through the earth's poles. The heavens, visible and invisible, excluding the parts that never rise and that never set, were thus divided into twelve parts, six being above the horizon and six below. But there was considerable diversity in the details of the rule for dividing the heavens into houses. They are of different relative magnitudes, according to the different rules which were used for finding their limits. The twelve houses were numbered round from east to south, and so on, beginning with that which lay in the east immediately below the horizon. The first house was called the house of life; the second, that of riches; the third, that of brethren; the fourth, that of parents; the fifth, that of children; the sixth, that of sickness; the seventh, that of marriage; the eighth, that of death; the ninth, that of religion and learning; the tenth, that of dignities; the eleventh, that of friends and benefactors; and the twelfth, that of enemies or of captivity. The succeedent houses are the second, fifth, eighth, and eleventh. The cadent houses are the third, sixth, ninth, and twelfth.

Saturn being in the sixth house, in opposition to Mars retrograde in the House of Life, cannot but denote long and dangerous sickness. Scott, Kenilworth, xviii.

11. A square or division on a chess-board.—12. The workhouse; poorhouse. [Colloq.]

We've had Larkins the baker coming to inquire if there's parish pay to look to for your bill, Mrs. Armstrong, and I have told him No, not a farthing, not the quarter of a farthing, unless you'll come into the house.
Mrs. Trollope, Michael Armstrong, iv.

He is now in his fifty-sixth year, chearful, gay, and hearty; keeps a good house both in town and country.
Addison.

To keep house, to be at the head of a household, or to manage its affairs.

A narrow cave ran in beneath the cliff:
In this the children play'd at keeping house.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

To keep open house, to offer hospitality freely and generally.

I believe papa had the pleasure of inviting Mr. Sparkler twice or thrice, but it was nothing. We had so many people about us, and kept such open house that . . . it was less than nothing. Dickens, Little Dorrit, ii. 7.

To keep the house, to be confined to the house; stay within doors.

Gentle sickness, gradually Weakening the man, till he could do no more,
But kept the house, his chair, and last his bed.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

To live in a glass house. See glass, a.—Upper house. See def. 6 (a).—Syn. 1. Inn, Hotel, etc. See tavern.

house[1] (houz), v.; pret. and pp. housed, ppr. housing. [< ME. housen, howsen, < AS. hūsian, house (= OFries. husa, receive into a house, = D. huizen, lodge, dwell, reside, = MLG. husen, receive into a house, = OHG. hūsōn, MHG. husen, G. hausen, reside, keep house, house, lodge, = Icel. hýsa = Dan. huse, house, harbor), < hūs, house: see house[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To put or receive into a house; provide with a dwelling or residence; put or keep under a roof; cover; shelter; protect by covering.

Thereabowte ye shalle yow howse,
And sone after that shalt be hur spowse.
MS. Cantab. Ff. ii. 38, f. 95. (Halliwell.)

Nay, good sir, house your head.

Even now we hous'd him in the abbey here.
Shak., C. of E., v. 1.

The priest ran away: they followed him till they housed him; what followed I know not.
Penn, Travels in Holland, etc.

3. To hide. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

If Mason had been a person of less habitual self-repression, he would not have been able to house his feelings so securely. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxi.

4. Naut.: (a) To arrange in the form of a ridged roof, as an awning, so as to shed rain. (b) To remove from exposure; put in a place of deposit or a state of security: as, to house a boat or a sail. A gun is housed by running it in on deck and securing it by tackle, muzzle-lashing, and breeching, after the breech has been depressed so that the muzzle rests against the side of the ship above the port. Topmasts and topgallantmasts are housed by partly lowering them, to lessen the effect of wind on the masts and rigging.

5. In carp., to fix in a socket, mortice, or other space cut out, as a board or timber fitting into another.

Wall strings are the supporters of the ends of the treads and risers. . . . They may be housed or left solid.
F. T. Hodgson, Stairbuilding, p. 12.

II. intrans. 1. To take shelter or lodging; take up abode; reside.

Follow this fair lady wherever she doth go,
And where she houses, come and let me know.
The Strand Garland.

house-agent (hous'ā″jent), n. One employed in the sale, renting, and care of houses.

house-ball (hous'bâl), n. A boys' game in which a ball is thrown by one player against a house or wall, in order that the second player may strike it with a bat on the rebound.

house-boat (hous'bōt), n. A boat fitted up as a house, and commonly more or less resembling one in form and arrangements, for permanent or temporary habitation. Such boats have long been the only dwellings of many thousands of families in the waters of some eastern countries, intended either to be stationary or to be moved by towing or by oars or sweeps, and in Hindustan and Burma are known as house-boats. They abound even more largely in China; but the boat distinctively called a house-boat there is one for use in excursions or in traveling. The English house-boat is an adaptation of the latter idea, being supplied with all conveniences for living on board as in a house during a prolonged excursion, especially on the Thames.

> The ordinary house-boat, as you know, is a great big unwieldy thing, with a square stern; you don't go voyages in her; . . . and you take down your party of friends, and have skylarking.
> W. Black, Strange Adventures of a House-Boat, iii.

★house-fly (hous'flī), n. [= D. huisvlieg = Dan. husflue = Sw. husfluga.] The common fly, Musca domestica. It is a dipterous or two-winged insect, of the family Muscidæ and the order Diptera, of the suborder Brachycera (having short feelers or antennæ), and of the subdivision Dichætæ (having the sucker or proboscis composed of only two pieces). It is a good representative of the large family Muscidæ, and indeed of the whole order Diptera. It is found in nearly all parts of the world. It lays its eggs in bunches or clusters in almost any kind of decaying animal or vegetable matter, as carrion, manure, and other filth, and the maggots hatch in a day or less, according to the degree of heat (of decomposition) to which they are subjected. The larvæ are small, headless, legless maggots, which attain their full size in about two weeks, and then crawl into some dry place to pupate. This process occupies a week or two, and on its completion the perfect fly emerges from the pupa. The house-fly is furnished with a suctorial proboscis, from which, when feeding on any dry substance, it exudes a liquid; this, by moistening the food, fits it to be sucked. Its feet are beset with hairs, each terminating in a disk which is supposed to act as a sucker, enabling it to walk on smooth surfaces, even with its back down, as on a ceiling. These disks are supposed to exude a liquid, making the adhesion more perfect. See also cut of compound eye, under eye[1].

House-fly (Musca domestica).
a, larva or maggot; b, puparium; c, adult fly (cross shows natural size); d, mouth-parts; e, foot. (All magnified.)

Huguenot (hū'ge-not), n. [= Sp. Hugonote = Pg. Huguenote = It. Ugonotto (NL. Hucnoticus, A. D. 1562), < F. Huguenot, a Huguenot; prob. ult. < F. Huguenot, a personal name (found as a surname as early as 1387), dim. of Hugo, Hugon, Hugues, < MHG. Hūg, Hūc, Hugh, a man's name, < MHG. huge, OHG. hugu = OS. hugi = AS. hyge, hige, mind, thought: cf. hogu, care: see how[4]. The name as applied to the Protestants of France was first used about 1560, being appar. imported from Geneva, where it appears to have been for some time in use as a political nickname. Its particular origin is unknown; no contemporary information has been found. No person named Huguenot is conspicuous in the history of the Huguenots; but the nickname, if it is of personal origin, may have taken that form as a popular substitute for some obscure original. Scheler mentions some 16 proposed etymologies, of which 8 rest on the name Hugo or Hugues. One of the others refers the name to the Swiss eidguenot, repr. G. eidgenoss, pl. eidgenossen, confederates, lit. 'oath-fellows,' < eid = E. oath, + genoss, MHG. genōz = AS. geneát, a fellow, companion: see oath and geneat. The F. word was at first used and felt as a term of reproach, prob. because it was regarded as a synonym of Genevan, i. e. 'a foreign (German) heretic.'] A member of the Reformed or Calvinistic communion of France in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Huguenots were the Puritans of France, noted in general for their austere virtues and the singular purity of their lives. They were persecuted in the reign of Francis I. and his immediate successors, and after 1562 were frequently at war with the Catholics, under the lead of such men as Admiral Coligny and the King of Navarre (afterward Henry IV. of France). In spite of these wars and the massacre of St. Bartholomew, August 24th, 1572, they continued numerous and powerful, and the edict of Nantes, issued by Henry IV. (1598), secured to them full political and civil rights. Their political power was broken after the surrender of La Rochelle in 1628, and the revocation of the edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. (1685) and the subsequent persecutions forced hundreds of thousands into exile to Prussia, the Netherlands, Switzerland, England, etc. Many settled in the colonies of New York, Virginia, etc., but especially in South Carolina. The name is sometimes applied at the present day to the descendants of the original Huguenots.

Huguenotism (hū'ge-not-izm), n. [< Huguenot + -ism.] The religion and principles of the Huguenots.

Rae, Contemporary Socialism, p. 114.

Here we have the stern Puritanism of old Birmingham passing into modern nonconformity, . . . and this milder form of the old spirit mellowing at last into nineteenth-century humanism. Nineteenth Century, XX. 246.

I neither admit the moral influence of theism in the past, nor look forward to the moral influence of humanism in the future. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 249.

3. The subjects of study called the humanities; hence, polite learning in general; literary culture; especially, in the revival of learning in the middle ages, the intelligent and appreciative study of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew letters, which was introduced by Petrarch in Italy, and spread thence throughout Europe.

humanist (hū'man-ist), n. and a. [= F. humaniste = Sp. Pg. humanista = It. umanista; as human + -ist.] I. n. 1. One accomplished in literary and classical culture; especially, in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, one of the scholars who, following the impulse of Petrarch, pursued and disseminated the study and a truer understanding of classical, and particularly of Greek, literature. The active enthusiasm of the humanists was the chief factor in accomplishing the Renaissance.

The author of Utopia was known for tolerant and liberal: he was a humanist and a reformer.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., i.

Among the men of letters were many of the most eminent humanists, such as Leonardo Bruni Aretino, scholar and statesman, born in 1369.
C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 252.

He [Hermann Lotze] is now one of the noblest living humanists, as contrasted with the specialist on the one hand, and with the eclectic . . . on the other.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 94.

2. A student of human nature, or of matters of human interest; one versed in human affairs and relations.

Equally pleased with a watch, a coach, . . . or a fact in hydrostatics, Pepys was pleased yet more by the beauty, the worth, the mirth, or the mere scenic attitude in life of his fellow-creatures. He shows himself throughout a sterling humanist. R. L. Stevenson, Samuel Pepys.

II. a. Humanistic.

Italy, that holy land of Humanist enthusiasm.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 412.

humanistic (hū-ma-nis'tik), a. [< humanist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to humanity or the humanities; characteristic of humanists or of humanism.

No mystic dreams of ascetic piety had come to trouble the tranquillity of its humanistic devotion. J. Caird.

Science . . . substitutes a world of force and law for a world of humanistic divinities.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 148.

The old Plutonic gods do not assert themselves; they are buried and turned to dust, and the more modern humanistic divinities bear sway.
J. Burroughs, The Century, XXVII. 113.

humanistically (hū-ma-nis'ti-kal-i), adv. In a humane manner; by means of the humanities.

Apart from current controversies stood the teachings of the school of Chartres, humanistically nourished on the study of the ancients. A. Seth, Encyc. Brit., XXI. 423.

humanitarian (hū-man-i-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< humanity + -arian.] I. a. 1. In theol., affirming the humanity or human nature of Christ, but denying his divinity.—2. Having regard to the interests of humanity, or all mankind; broadly philanthropic.

Humanitarian, wider of scope than philanthropic, is a word pregnant with significance.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 316.

II. n. 1. In theol.: (a) One who asserts the mere humanity of Jesus Christ, and denies his divinity; a Unitarian. Some humanitarians hold that Christ was the subject of a divine inspiration which rendered his human nature an extraordinary one. (b) One who maintains the perfectibility of human nature without the aid of grace.—2. One who adopts the doctrine or theory that man's sphere of duty is limited to a benevolent interest in and practical promotion of the welfare of the human race, apart from all considerations of religion.—3. A philanthropist.

humanitarianism (hū-man-i-tā′ri-an-izm), n. [< humanitarian + -ism.] 1. In theol., the doctrine that Jesus Christ possessed a human nature only.—2. The doctrine that mankind may become perfect without divine aid.—3. The doctrine that benevolence or philanthropy forms the sum of man's duties.

Pierre Leroux, who at a later period became the exponent of Humanitarianism, a kind of Saint-Simonism modified and tinctured with Hegelian philosophy.
R. T. Ely, French and German Socialism, p. 72.

4. Humane or humanitarian principles; comprehensive humanism or philanthropy.

Christianity, by reason of the simplicity of its doctrines, the sublime humanitarianism of its ethics.
J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 58.

Humanitarianism aims at the reorganization of society, so that all shall possess equal advantages for gaining a livelihood and contributing to the welfare of society.
L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 450.

humanitian† (hū-ma-nish′an), n. [Irreg. < humanity + -ian.] A humanist.

There was an orator there, a man of great reading, a singular scholar, and an excellent humanitian.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 588.

Nay, sir, I have read history. I am a little humanitian.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 3.

humanity (hū-man′i-ti), n. [< ME. humanitye, < OF. humanite, humainete, F. humanité = Pr. humanitat = Sp. humanidad = Pg. humanidade = It. umanità = D. humaniteit = G. humanität = Dan. Sw. humanitet, < L. humanita(t-)s, human nature, humanity, also humane conduct, < humanus, human, humane: see human, humane.] 1. The condition or quality of being human; human character or nature.

The nature and condition of man, wherin he is lesse than God Almyghty, and excellynge not withstandyng al other creatures in erth, is called humanitie.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 8.

There is no such thing as stereotyped humanity; it must ever be a vague, bodiless idea, because the concrete units from which it is formed are independent realities.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 268.

In the deluge, Fintan escaped by taking the form of a salmon, until the receding waters left him high and dry on Tara Hill, when he resumed his humanity.
W. S. Gregg, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 4.

2. Mankind collectively; the human race.

Humanity must perforce prey on itself,
Like monsters of the deep.
Shak., Lear, iv. 2.

It was cutting very close to the bone to carve such a shred of humanity from the body politic to make a soldier of.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 61.

3. The character of being humane; consideration for the sensibilities of others, and sympathy with their needs or suffering; kindness; benevolence; a disposition to relieve distress, whether of men or of animals, and to treat all creatures kindly.

To withdraw something from thyself to give to other—that is a point of humanity and gentleness, which never taketh away so much commodity as it bringeth again.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 7.

Are you angry, sir,
Because you are entertain'd with all humanity?
Freely and nobly us'd?
Beau. and Fl., Custom of the Country, iii. 2.

The notion of what, for want of a better phrase, I must call a moral brotherhood in the whole human race has been steadily gaining ground during the whole course of history, and we have now a large abstract term answering to this notion—Humanity.
Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 64.

4†. Politeness; civility.

To prate in thy maysters presence, it is no humanitye.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 86.

There cannot be a greater argument of the general good understanding of a people than a sudden consent to give their approbation of a sentiment which has no emotion in it. If it were spoken with never so great skill in the actor, the manner of uttering that sentence could have nothing in it which could strike any but people of the greatest humanity—nay, people elegant and skilful in observations upon it.
Steele, Spectator, No. 502.

5. Learning or literature of a merely human or secular kind: opposed to divinity: generally in the plural, with reference to the several branches of such literature, as philology, grammar, rhetoric, poetry, the study of the ancient classics, and the like. In Scotland, in the singular, applied to Latin and Latin literature alone: as, a professor of humanity.

Philological studies, when philology . . . was restricted to the cultivation of the languages, literature, history, and archæology of Greece and Rome, were very commonly called literæ humaniores, or, in English, the humanities; and it is the conviction of their value as a moral and intellectual discipline which has led scholars almost universally to ascribe the origin of this appellation to a sense of their refining, elevating, and humanizing influence. This, however, I think is an erroneous etymology. They were called literæ humaniores, the humanities, by way of opposition to the literæ divinæ, or divinity, the two studies, philology and theology, then completing the circle of scholastic knowledge, which, at the period of the introduction of the phrase, scarcely included any branch of physical science.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., iii.

humbug (hum′bug), n. [First in use about 1735–40, as a piece of fashionable slang, with exactly its present sense; but Dean Milles defines it (about 1760) as "a false alarm, a bugbear," appar. a more orig. sense; < hum[2], a dial. and slang term, delude, impose on, cajole, + bug[1], a specter, goblin (see hum[2] and bug[1]); but, as in other slang terms, little regard was paid to the elements of which it is formally composed. The use of humbug in ref. to a person is more recent; cf. fraud, similarly used in colloquial speech.] 1. A trick; an imposition, especially an imposition perpetrated under fair and honorable pretenses; a hoax.

There is a word very much in vogue with the people of taste and fashion, which, though it has not even the "penumbra" of a meaning, yet makes up the sum total of the wit, sense, and judgement of the aforesaid people of taste and fashion!—"This peace will prove a confounded humbug upon the nation.—These theatrical managers humbug the town damnably!"—Humbug is neither an English word, nor a derivative from any other language. It is indeed a blackguard sound, made use of by most people of distinction! It is a fine make-weight in conversation, and some great men deceive themselves so egregiously as to think they mean something by it!
The Student (1751), II. 41. (Todd.)

I remember the origin of that word humbug, which has reigned in high vogue for several years, but I hope this will not prove another humbug.

humerocubital (hū″mē-rō-kū'bi-tal), a. 1. In anat., pertaining to the humerus and to the cubit or ulna, as a muscle which arises from one and is inserted into the other of these bones.—2. In ichth., relating to the confluent so-called humerus, ulna, and radius exemplified in siluroid fishes; of or belonging to the coracoid or paraglenal. Günther.

humerodigital (hū″mē-rō-dij'i-tal), a. Pertaining to the humerus and a finger; arising from the humerus and inserted into a finger or into the digits collectively, as a muscle.

humerodorsal (hū″mē-rō-dôr'sal), a. Pertaining to the humerus and the back.

humerodorsalis (hū″mē-rō-dôr-sā'lis), n. [NL.] A muscle of the hedgehog arising from the humerus near the origin of the humero-abdominalis, passing through the axilla, and expanding upon the integument of the back and upon the orbicularis panniculi, the action of which it assists.

b, bicipital groove; cf, coronoid fossa; ec, external condyle, or epicondyle; gt, greater tuberosity, or trochiter; h, head; ic, internal condyle, or epitrochlea; lh, capitellum, for articulation with radius; lt, lesser tuberosity, or trochin; t, trochlea, for articulation with ulna. Between h and gt or lt is the anatomical neck of the bone; a little below b is the surgical neck of the bone.

humerometacarpal (hū″mē-rō-met-a-kär'pal), a. Pertaining to the humerus and the metacarpus; arising from the humerus and inserted into the metacarpus, as a muscle.

humeroradial (hū″mē-rō-rā'di-al), a. Pertaining to the humerus and the radius, or the upper arm and the forearm: specifically applied to the ratio of length between these parts.

> A long forearm (humero-radial index 80). W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., [XXVIII. 316.

humerus (hū'mē-rus), n.; pl. humeri (-rī). [= F. humérus = Sp. húmero = Pg. humero = It. umero, omero, < L. humerus, a common but incorrect spelling of umerus, the shoulder, prop. the upper bone of the arm; = Gr. ὦμος, the shoulder, = Goth. amsa, the shoulder, = Skt. ansa, the shoulder.] 1. In anat.: (a) The bone of the upper arm, extending from the shoulder-joint to the elbow-joint. In all the higher vertebrates it is a single bone, usually of much greater length than thickness, and more or less cylindrical, but in a few cases short and stout and very irregular. It articulates above with the scapula, or scapula and coracoid, by a convex head; below by its condyles with the bones of the forearm. It is remarkably slender and cylindrical in man, and still more so in bats. See cut under epicondyle. (b) The proscapula of fishes: so called by Cuvier and his followers. (c) The mesocoracoid of fishes: so designated by Owen and others. (d†) The shoulder or upper arm and associated parts.—2. In entom.: (a) The femur of the fore leg; the brachium. Kirby and Spence. (b) The subcostal or submarginal vein of the fore wing of certain hymenopters. Walker. (c) The front corner of the thoracic region seen from above; the shoulder: this may be the prothorax, as in Coleoptera, or the mesothorax, as in Diptera.—Anconeal fossa of the humerus. See anconeal.

humet, humette[1] (hū-met'), n. [Origin obscure.] In her., a fesse or bar couped or cut off short at each end, and so forming a simple rectangle with its longer sides horizontal.

humeté, humetté, humettee (hū-me-tā', -tē'), a. In her., couped at each end or arm, so that the extremities do not reach the sides of the escutcheon: applied to the chevron, fesse, cross, and the like.

humette[2] (hū-met'), n. A cap of fence worn by archers and other infantry soldiers in the fifteenth century.

humgruffin (hum'gruf-in), n. [A made word, based on hum[1], v. i., + gruff[1], mixed with griffin.] A terrible or repulsive person. [Humorous.]

> All shrunk from the glance of that keen-flashing eye,
> Save one horrid Humgruffin, who seem'd by his talk,
> And the airs he assumed, to be cock of the walk.
> Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 198.

humhum (hum'hum), n. [E. Ind.] A kind of plain, coarse Indian cloth, made of cotton.

Humian (hū'mi-an), a. Of or pertaining to David Hume (1711–76), a Scottish philosopher and historian, or to his philosophy or writings. Hume carried sensationalism and individualism to their extreme consequences, resulting in philosophical skepticism. The study of Hume roused Kant to the production of his "Critique of the Pure Reason," which is largely a refutation of Hume's skepticism.

> The principal effort of the Humian school has been to abrogate relations not only from the sphere of reality, but from the sphere of consciousness. W. James, Mind, IX. 4.

> The Humian theory was believed to lead inevitably to scepticism and infidelity. Encyc. Brit., IV. 387.

humic (hū'mik), a. [< humus + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from mold (humus).—Humic acid, an acid found in humus, or formed from it by boiling with an alkali. Its salts are called humates.

humicubation† (hū″mi-kū-bā'shon), n. [< L. humus, the ground, humi, on the ground, + cubatio(n-), a lying down, < cubare, lie down.] A lying on the ground; penitential prostration.

> Fasting and sackcloth, and ashes and tears, and humicubations, used to be companions of repentance. Abp. Bramhall.

> Lents, Embers, Vigils, Groans, Humicubations. J. Beaumont, Psyche, v. 146.

humid (hū'mid), a. [< F. humide = Pr. humid = Sp. húmedo = Pg. humido = It. umido, < L. humidus, correctly ūmidus, moist, < hūmēre, correctly ūmēre, be moist, akin to ūvens, moist, ūvidus, ūdus, moist: cf. Gr. ὑγρός, moist (see hygro-), Icel. vökr, moist, > E. dial. wokey, moist, ME. wokien, be moist. Hence humor, etc.] Moist, or accompanied with moisture; containing, or formed or effected by, water or vapor; wet or watery; damp.

> On which the sun more glad impress'd his beams
> Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow.
> Milton, P. L., iv. 151.

> Fearless of humid air and gathering rains, > Forth steps the man. Cowper, Task, i. 212.

Humid process. See assaying.—Syn. Damp, Dank, etc. See moist.

humidify (hū-mid'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. humidified, ppr. humidifying. [< humid + -i-fy.] To make humid. [Rare.]

> Humidifying the air in mills. The Engineer, LXV. 353.

humidity (hū-mid'i-ti), n. [< ME. humidytee, < OF. humidité, F. humidité = Pr. humiditat = Sp. humididad (cf. Pg. humidade) = It. umidità, < L. humidita(t-)s, correctly umidita(t-)s, moisture, < umidus, moist: see humid.] 1. The state of being humid; moisture; dampness; especially, a moderate degree of wetness which is perceptible to the eye or touch.

> Till it be harde, unwattred must it be,
> Lest alle the werk corrupte humyditee.
> Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 183.

> O blessed breeding sun, draw from the earth
> Rotten humidity. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

2. In meteor., the amount of aqueous vapor in the atmosphere compared with that which is required to saturate it under the given condition as to temperature: specifically called relative humidity. If the atmosphere is completely saturated, the humidity is expressed as 100; if perfectly dry, as 0. The humidity varies widely in different places, and in the same place at different times.

humidness (hū'mid-nes), n. Humidity.

humifuse (hū'mi-fūs), a. [= F. humifuse, < L. humus, the ground, humi, on the ground, + fusus, pour or spread out, pp. of fundere, pour: see fuse[1] and found[3].] In bot., spread over the surface of the ground; procumbent: as, a humifuse plant.

humilet, a. [< L. humilis, low, humble: see humble[3], the older form.] Lowly; humble.

humilet, v. t. [< humile, a. Cf. humiliate, humble[3], v.] To humble.

> Davyd ought to humyle himselfe. Bp. Fisher.

humiliant (hū-mil'i-ant), a. [= F. humiliant = Sp. humillante = Pg. humilhante = It. umiliante, < LL. humilian(t-)s, ppr. of humiliare, humiliate: see humiliate.] Humiliating. [Rare.]

> The melancholy of humiliant thoughts. Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

humiliate (hū-mil'i-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. humiliated, ppr. humiliating. [< LL. humiliatus, pp. of humiliare (> It. umiliare = Sp. humillar = Pg. humilhar = Pr. humiliar, umiliar, omeliar = F. humilier), abase, humble, < L. humilis, lowly, humble: see humble[3].] To cause to be or appear lower or more humble; depress; especially, to abase in estimation; subject to shame or disgrace; mortify: as, to humiliate one's self by a confession; to humiliate a boaster.

> We stand humiliated rather than encouraged. Arnold.

—Syn. Debase, Degrade, etc. (see abase); mortify, shame, put to shame, put down, dishonor.

humiliating (hū-mil'i-ā-ting), p. a. [Ppr. of humiliate, v.] Humbling; depressing or bating pride; mortifying.

> The citizens of Madrid have more than once besieged their sovereign in his own palace, and extorted from him the most humiliating concessions. Macaulay, Machiavelli.

> This humiliating peace of Presburg, by which Austria lost 23,000 square miles of territory and almost 3,000,000 of inhabitants, was a prelude to the complete overthrow of the German empire. Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, App. ii., p. 401.

humiliation (hū-mil-i-ā'shon), n. [= F. humiliation = Pr. humiliatio = Sp. humillación = Pg. humiliação = It. umiliazione, < LL. humiliatio(n-), < humiliare, humiliate: see humiliate.] The act of humiliating or humbling, or the state of being humiliated; abasement; mortification.

> The former was an humiliation of Deity: the latter an humiliation of manhood. Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

> The miseries and humiliations of dependence . . . had not broken the spirit of Machiavelli. Macaulay, Machiavelli.

> Note the humiliation he suffers from being looked down upon as of no account amongst men. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 250.

humility (hū-mil'i-ti), n.; pl. humilities (-tiz). [< ME. humilite, < OF. humilite, F. humilité = Pr. humilitat, omilitat = Sp. humildad = Pg. humildade = It. umilità, < L. humilita(t-)s, lowness, meanness, baseness, in LL. (eccl.) humility, < humilis, low, lowly, humble: see humble[3].] 1. The state or character of being humble; freedom from pride and arrogance; lowliness of mind; a low estimate of one's self; self-abasement.

> The fear of the Lord is the instruction of wisdom; and before honour is humility. Prov. xv. 33.

> Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears. Acts xx. 19.

> Owe not thy humility unto humiliation from adversity. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 14.

> It is the mark of nobleness to volunteer the lowest service, the greatest spirit only attaining to humility. Emerson, Civilization.

2†. An act of submission.

> With these humilities they satisfied the young king. Sir J. Davies.

3. A name of several different tattlers or totanine birds of the family Scolopacidæ. (a) The semipalmated tattler or willet, Symphemia semipalmata. [Massachusetts.] (b) The greater yellowlegs, Totanus melanoleucus. Audubon. [Maine.] (c) The Bartramian sandpiper. Trumbull. [Long Island, New York.] (d) The Hudsonian godwit, Limosa hæmastica. [Local, U. S.]

—Syn. 1. Meekness, humbleness, lowliness, diffidence.

humin (hū′min), n. [< humus + *-in*2.] A neutral indifferent substance said by Mulder to exist in black humus. It may also be prepared from sugar or starch by the action of a mineral acid. Its composition and properties have not as yet been fully investigated.

Humiri (hū-mī′ri), n. [NL., < umiri, umire, the native name (Tupi) in Brazil and Guiana.] A genus of balsamiferous shrubs or trees, of the family Humiriaceæ, founded by Aublet in 1775. It is characterized by having 20 stamens, which are united by their base, and either all entire and bearing 1 anther, or with 5 larger, 3-cleft at the apex, and bearing 3 anthers; the disk is 10-lobed or 10-parted; the leaves are alternate, simple, entire, or crenulate; and the flowers are white and arranged in cymes. Three species are known, all natives of tropical America. H. balsamiferum is a tree 40 feet high, having a reddish wood used in house-building; the bark when wounded yields a reddish balsamic juice, which is burned as a perfume when dry, and is also used in the preparation of an ointment. H. floribundum is a small tree called umiri. Its bark is greatly esteemed by the Brazilians as a perfume, and when wounded yields a delightfully fragrant yellow balsam known as balsam of umiri.

Humiriaceæ (hū-mir-i-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Humiri + -aceæ.] A small family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, typified by the genus Humiri. The species are, with few exceptions, tropical South American trees or shrubs, abounding in a resinous juice. They are characterized by having regular hermaphrodite flowers, with 5 small imbricate sepals and 5 hypogynous deciduous petals, 10 or many hypogynous monadelphous stamens, and a 5-celled ovary. The fruit is a drupe, with albuminous seed and orthotropous embryo.

Humism (hū′mizm), n. [< Hume (see def.) + -ism.] The philosophical doctrines of David Hume. See Humian.

Yet Berkeley in certain passages verges toward Humism, as, for example, where he says: "The very existence of ideas constitutes the soul. Mind is a congeries of perceptions. Take away perceptions, and you take away mind. Put the perceptions, and you put the mind."
Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 86.

★humite (hū′mīt), n. [Named after Sir Abraham Hume.] Originally, a mineral from Vesuvius, occurring in small crystals yellow to brown in color, and belonging, as was believed, to three types of crystalline form. It was regarded as identical with chondrodite. At present these three varieties are accepted as distinct species or subspecies, and are called humite, chondrodite, and clinohumite. The name humite includes only the kind crystallizing in the orthorhombic system; the other two are monoclinic, but differ in angles and planes. They have all nearly the same chemical composition, being fluosilicates of magnesium and iron. See chondrodite.

humlet, a. An obsolete form of *humble*2.

hummel (hum′el), v. and a. See *humble*2.

hummeler (hum′el-ėr), n. [< hummel + *-er*1.] One who or that which humbles; specifically, an instrument or machine for separating the awns of barley from the seed.

hummeling-machine (hum′el-ing-ma-shēn′), n. A machine for breaking off the awns of barley. It consists of a vertical shaft provided with several beaters at several different levels and revolving rapidly in a cylindrical case, so as to beat the grain as it falls. E. H. Knight.

hummer (hum′ėr), n. [< *hum*1 + *-er*1.] 1. One who or that which hums.

Loved of bee — the tawny hummer.
Emerson, To Ellen.

Denizens of water and marsh sent forth their voices, jerky and out of accord with the united buzz of the hosts of field and wood hummers. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 48.

2. One who or that which excels in any quality, especially in general energy or speed. [Slang.] —3. In ornith., a humming-bird.—Attic hummer. See *Attic*1.—Helmet hummer, any bird of the subgenus Calypte.

hummie (hum′i), n. [Cf. hump, hummock.] A small protuberance. See the quotation, and hump, n., 2. Jamieson.

A growth on the back of the neck called a hummie, the result of long friction, is needful to enable a man to balance a plank [in discharging cargoes] with any degree of comfort. Nineteenth Century, XXII. 486.

humming (hum′ing), n. [Verbal n. of *hum*1, v.] A sound like that made by bees; a low murmuring sound.

Good man, he's troubled with matter of more moment; Hummings of higher nature vex his brains, sir.
Fletcher, Pilgrim, ii. 2.

The musical accents of the Indians to us are but inarticulate hummings. Glanville.

humming (hum′ing), p. a. [Ppr. of *hum*1, v.] 1. Resounding with hums.

And many a rose-carnation feed
With summer spice the humming air.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, ci.

2. Such as to bubble or froth much, or as to cause a humming in the head: applied to strong malt liquors.

They presently fetch'd in a brace of fat does,
With humming strong liquor likewise.
Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 221).

A glass of wine or humming beer,
The heart and spirit for to cheer.
Poor Robin (1735).

★humming-bird (hum′ing-bėrd), n. A bird whose wings, by their rapid vibration, make a humming sound; any bird of the family Trochilidæ. Humming-birds are the most brilliant as well as the smallest of birds, averaging under 3 inches in length, including the bill, which is relatively long and slender, and usually straight, but sometimes decurved or recurved. The tongue is slender and extensile, and constructed like a double-barreled tube; it is used, like the haustellum of an insect, to suck the sweets of flowers. The birds, however, also eat insects. They build a nest, generally like a little cup, coated outside with lichens, and lined with gossamer, plant-down, and other delicate fibers. The eggs are always two in number, and pure white. The wings are narrow and acute or falcate, and so rapidly vibrated as to become indistinct to view; the flight is very swift. The feet are very small and fitted only for perching, not for progression. The tail is of every shape, and sometimes longer than the rest of the bird. A few of the humming-birds are dull-colored, but most of them glitter with the most exquisite hues of iridescent quality or metallic luster, changing in different lights. Shining grass-green is the most frequent color, but many other tints are found, as purple, violet, steel-blue, golden green, crimson, and various shades of fiery red, particularly about the head, where many species are also ornamented with crests, ruffs, and gorgets not less elegant in form than in color. All the humming-birds are confined to America, extending from Alaska to Patagonia, and they are especially numerous between the tropics. The latest critical authority on the subject describes 426 species, of 125 genera. About 16 genera are known to occur in the United States. The commonest of these, and the only one known east of the Mississippi, is the ruby-throat, Trochilus colubris. The northernmost is the rufous or Nootka Sound hummer, Selasphorus rufus. The largest in the United States is Eugenes fulgens, about 4 inches long. Amazilia fuscicaudata is a rather large one. The giants among them all reach a length, bill included, of about 7 inches. Also called humbird and hummer.

Humming-birds.
Upper figure, Trochilus colubris; lower figure, Amazilia fuscicaudata.

Yet by some object every brain is stirr'd:
The dull may waken to a humming-bird.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 446.

Humming-bird bush, a small leguminous shrub, Æschynomene Montevidensis, of South America: so called because the humming-birds are specially fond of visiting its flowers.—Humming-bird hawk-moth. See hawk-moth.

hummock (hum′ok), n. [Also written hommock and hammock; perhaps an assimilated form of humpock*, dim. of hump (like hillock, dim. of *hill*1); cf. LG. hümpel, a little heap or mound: see hump. Cf. hummie.] 1. A low elevation, hillock, or knoll. The word was much used by the early navigators to designate a rounded mass of land seen in the distance. It is now chiefly applied — (a) to the protuberances on the surface of a mass of rough ice, particularly in high latitudes; (b) to the hillocks or more or less solid spots rising above the general level of a swamp or of marshy land. Hummocks, or islets as they are sometimes called, constitute a marked feature of the swamps and savannas of the southern Atlantic States, and are often covered with dense forest-growth.

Along a flat, level country, over delightful green savannas, decorated with hommocks or islets of dark groves consisting of Magnolia grandiflora.
Bartram, Travels through North and South Carolina, etc. [(Lond., 1792), p. 219.

A hummock is a protuberance raised upon any plane of ice above the common level. . . . To hummocks, principally, the ice is indebted for its variety of fanciful shapes, and its picturesque appearance.
Scoresby, Account of Arctic Regions (Edin., 1820), I. 226.

I have penetrated to those meadows on the morning of many a first spring day, jumping from hummock to hummock, from willow-root to willow-root.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 339.

2. (a) The form of the hand when the fingers are joined and bent in an even line, or bunched with the end of the thumb: as, to mak' a hummock. (b) As much of any loose material as can be taken up in the hand with the fingers so bent: as, a hummock of meal. [Scotch.]

hummocked (hum′okt), a. [< hummock + *-ed*2.] Resembling a hummock; exhibiting or characterized by hummocks.

The hills [of Iceland] are in long hummocked masses.
Miss Oswald.

hummocky (hum′ok-i), a. [< hummock + *-y*1.] Abounding in or full of hummocks.

Ice . . . so hummocky that sledging over it would be impracticable. C. F. Hall, Polaris Expedition, p. 141.

hummum, n. See hammam.

humor, humour (hū′- or ū′mor), n. [< ME. humour, humor, in the old med. sense, also (after L.) moisture, < OF. humor, later humeur, F. humeur, moisture, sap, juice, wet, = Pr. humor, umor, ymor = Sp. Pg. humor = It. umore, humor, = D. humeur, temper, humor, disposition, humor, humor, sensibleness (of style), = G. humōr, humor, hūmor, moisture, humor, = Dan. Sw. humor, humor, humör, humor, mood, temper (partly < F., partly < L.), < L. humor (humōr-), correctly umor (umōr-), moisture, < humēre, correctly umēre, be moist: see humid.] 1. Moisture; an exhalation.

Lette diche it deep that humoure oute may leke.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 150.

Is it physical
To walk unbraced, and suck up the humours
Of the dank morning? Shak., J. C., ii. 1.

2. An animal fluid, whether natural or morbid; now, especially, any of the thinner bodily fluids, limpid, serous, or sanious, as the constituent fluids or semi-fluids of the eye, or the watery matter in some cutaneous eruptions. The four cardinal humors of ancient physicians were the blood, choler (yellow bile), phlegm, and melancholy (black bile), regarded by them as determining, by their conditions and proportions, a person's physical and mental qualities and disposition. See temperament.

Mens bodies be not more full of ill humors than commonlie mens myndes . . . be full of fansies, opinions, errors, and faults. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 115.

Emil. Is he not jealous?
Des. Who, he? I think the sun, where he was born,
Drew all such humours from him. Shak., Othello, iii. 4.

Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

Hence—3. One's special condition of mind or quality of feeling; peculiarity of disposition, permanent or temporary; mental state; mood: as, a surly humor; a strange humor.

Therefore as one lackynge the quyche humure of deuocion, I cannot long contynue in prayer.
Bp. Fisher, The Seven Penitential Psalms, Ps. cxliii.

Page. Sir Hugh is there, is he?
Host. He is there: see what humour he is in.
Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 3.

The French Nation value themselves upon Civility, and build and dress mostly for Figure: This Humour makes the Curiosity of Strangers very easie and welcome to them.
Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 2.

Specifically—(a) Disposition, especially a capricious disposition; freak; whim; vagary; oddness of mood or manners: in this sense very fashionable in the time of Shakspere.

Cob. What is that humour? some rare thing, I warrant. . . .
Cash. It is a gentleman-like monster, bred in the special gallantry of our time, by affectation, and fed by folly.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

Give me leave to tell you that there is one Frailty, or rather ill-favoured Custom, that reigns in you, which weighs much; it is a Humour of swearing in all your Discourses.
Howell, Letters, I. v. 11.

Not thinking my self very safe, indeed, under a Man whose humours were so brutish and barbarous.
Dampier, Voyages, I. 518.

The ambiguity of the term [humour] has confounded it with humour itself: they are, however, so far distinct, that a humour—that is, some absorbing singularity in a character—may not necessarily be very humorous; it may be only absurd. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 241.

The village-folk, with all their humours quaint.
Whittier, The Countess.

(b) A facetious or jocular turn of mind, as in conversation; the disposition to find, or the faculty of finding, ludicrous aspects or suggestions in common facts or notions.

To entertain an audience perpetually with humour is to carry them from the conversation of gentlemen, and treat them with the follies and extravagancies of Bedlam.
Dryden, Mock Astrologer, Pref.

The ancients, indeed, appear not to have possessed that comic quality that we understand as humour, nor can I discover a word which exactly corresponds with our term humour in any language, ancient or modern.
I. D'Israeli, Lit. Char., p. 434.

Humour . . . is counted something genial and loving.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 249.

(c) In lit., witty, droll, or jocose imagination, conspicuous in thought and expression, and tending to excite amusement; that quality in composition which is characterized by the predominance of the ludicrous or absurdly incongruous in the choice or treatment of a theme: distinguished from wit, which implies superior subtlety and finer thought. Humor in literature may be further distinguished by its humane and sympathetic quality, by force of which it is often found blending the pathetic with the ludicrous, and by the same stroke moving to tears and laughter, in this respect improving upon the pure and often cold intellectuality which is the essence of wit.

What an ornament and safeguard is humor! Far better than wit for a poet and writer. It is a genius itself, and so defends from the insanities. Emerson, Scott.

The satire [of Chaucer] . . . is genial with the broad sunshine of humor, into which the victims walk forth with a delightful unconcern. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 254.

In those admirable touches of tender humour—and I should call humour, Bob, a mixture of love and wit—who can equal this great genius [Dickens]?
Thackeray, Brown the Younger, i. 3.

Acrimony of the humors. See acrimony.—Albugineous, aqueous, crystalline, etc., humor. See the adjectives.—Good humor, a cheerful, tranquil, unruffled temper or disposition. [Often written with a hyphen.]

What then remains, but well our power to use,
And keep good-humour still, whate'er we lose?
Pope, R. of the L., v. 30.

This portable quality of good humour seasons all the parts and occurrences we meet with in such a manner that there are no moments lost. Steele, Spectator, No. 100.

Humulineæ (hū-mū-lin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Humulus (-lin-) + -eæ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the family Moraceæ, proposed by Dumortier (1829), typified by the genus Humulus, the hop. This tribe is not retained by recent botanists, the genus being placed in the tribe Cannabineæ.

Humulus (hū'mū-lus), n. [NL., < ML. humulus, hummulus, also humulo, humolo, humlo (cf. OF. houblon, hop); appar. of Teut. origin: see hop[2]; but according to another view < L. humus, the ground, the plant creeping on the ground if not supported.] A genus of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous plants, of the family Moraceæ and tribe Cannabineæ. They have dicœcious flowers, the male in loose axillary panicles, with 5 sepals and 5 erect stamens, the female in short axillary and solitary spikes or catkins, with foliaceous imbricated bracts, each 2-flowered, in fruit forming a sort of membranaceous strobile. The plants are twining rough perennials, with mostly opposite, heart-shaped, and palmately 3- to 7-lobed leaves. Only two species are known: H. Lupulus, the common hop, which is widely cultivated, and another, a native of China and Japan. One species, H. palæolupulus, has been found in a fossil state in the Pliocene formation at Meximieux in the department of ★Ain, France. See cut under hop[2].

humus (hū'mus), n. [L., the earth, the ground, the soil, locative humi (= Gr. χαμαί), on the ground, to the ground: see Homo, chthonic, chameleon, etc. Hence humble, humility, etc.] Vegetable mold. It is a dark-brown or black substance, varying greatly in composition, produced by the decay of vegetable matter with a limited supply of air. It includes the brown vegetable matter of soils generally as well as swamp-muck, peat, etc. Humus contains several tolerably well-defined chemical compounds, including ulmin and ulmic acid, and humin and humic acid, and is an important factor in the fertility of soils. A precipitate from it is called gein.

humus-plant (hū'mus-plant), n. Same as saprophyte.

Hun[1] (hun), n. [AS. Hūnas and Hūne = Icel. Hūnar = MHG. Hiune, etc.; < LL. Hunni, LGr. Οὖννοι, also LL. Chunni, Chuni, LGr. Χοῦννοι, Χοῦνοι, pl., LL. sing. Hunnus*, Chunus, repr. the native name, identified, with some probability, with that of the Heungnoo or Hiongnu, a people who, according to Chinese annals, constituted, about the end of the 3d century B. C., a powerful empire stretching from the Great Wall of China to the Caspian. This would indicate that the Huns belonged to the Turkish branch of the Ural-Altaic race; in another view, they were of the Finnic branch; but the name is not connected, unless very remotely, with that of the Hungarians (Magyars), also of Finnic origin.] A member of an ancient Asiatic race of warlike nomads, probably of the Mongolian or Tatar stock, first appearing prominently in European history about A. D. 375. In that year they crossed the Volga and the Don, defeated the Goths, and drove them beyond the Danube. In the reign of their king Attila (about 434–454) they overran and ravaged the greater part of Europe, and compelled the Romans to pay tribute. After the death of Attila their power was broken, but their name continued to be applied in an indefinite way during the middle ages. They are described as ugly and savage, having dark complexions, small, deep-set black eyes, broad shoulders, flat noses, and no beard. Some authorities suppose that they were identical with the Finnic Bulgarians of later history.

The north by myriads pours her mighty sons,
Great nurse of Goths, of Alans, and of Huns!
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 90.

White Huns, an ancient people, probably of the Turkish race, who lived in central Asia. They were possibly ancestors of the Turkomans.

Hun[2] (hun), n. [Partly another use of Hun[1], by an erroneous assumption of the identity of the two peoples, and partly (in the U. S.) an abbr. of Hungarian.] A Hungarian.

Where furious Frank and fiery Hun
Shout in their sulphurous canopy.
Campbell, Hohenlinden.

hunch (hunch), n. [Not found in early records; an assibilated form of hunk[1], q. v.] 1. A hump; a protuberance: as, the hunch of a camel.—2. A thick piece; a hunk; a lump: as, a hunch of cheese.

His wife brought out the cut loaf and a piece of Wiltshire cheese, and I took them in hand, gave Richard a good hunch, and took another for myself. Cobbett.

3. [< hunch, v.] A push or jog with the fist or elbow, or by a cow with the horn.

hunch (hunch), v. t. [< hunch, n. In def. 2, prob. due in part to haunch, v.] 1. To round or thrust out or up in a protuberance; crook, as the back.

In a lake called Lyn Rathlyn, in Meireonethshire, is a very singular variety of perch: the back is quite hunched, and the lower part of the back bone, next the tail, strangely distorted. Pennant, Brit. Zoöl., The Common Perch.

Sometimes one of them got up and went to the desk, on which he leaned his elbows, hunching a pair of sloping shoulders to an uncollared neck. H. James, Jr., The Century, XXXI. 91.

2. To push or thrust with the elbow or (as a cow) with the horn; jog; hook.

Jack's friends began to hunch and push one another. Arbuthnot, Hist. John Bull.

A hundreth of hunteres, as I haf herde telle.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1143.

They sat down in ranks, by hundreds and by fifties. Mark vi. 40.

2. In early Teutonic hist., a territorial or administrative district; specifically, in southern and central England, a division or subdivision of a county (a corresponding division in northern England being called a wapentake). In ancient Germany the hundred also denoted, according to Tacitus, a group of persons. The origin of the territorial hundred is uncertain. Many consider it to be derived from bodies each composed of a hundred warriors; others find the origin in divisions of a hundred hides of land, groups of a hundred families, etc. The division of hundred was introduced into the colonies of Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware, and still exists in the last-named State. These divisions in England were the basis for the organization of the military service and for the administration of fiscal matters; each hundred had its hundred-moot and its hundred-court, with civil and criminal jurisdiction. In Maryland they served for election districts.

The constable's wife
Of some odd hundred in Essex.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1.

As ten families of freeholders made up a town or tithing, so ten tithings composed a superior division called a hundred, as consisting of ten times ten families. Blackstone, Com., Int., § 4.

It is very probable, as already stated, that the colonists of Britain arranged themselves in hundreds of warriors; it is not probable that they carved out the country into equal districts. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 45.

Equally involved in obscurity is the beginning of the hundred in Virginia, and the history of its various phases is rather curious, not only because it was the first English local division instituted in America, but, besides having both a territorial and personal signification, it assumed different relations to the general government of the colony at different periods. Johns Hopkins Hist. Studies, III. 143.

Chiltern Hundreds, a hilly district of Buckinghamshire, England, which has belonged to the British crown from time immemorial. To this district a nominal office is attached, of which the holder is called the Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds. As a member of the House of Commons not in any respect disqualified cannot resign his seat directly, any member who wishes to resign may accomplish his object by accepting the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which, being held to be a place of honor and profit under the crown, vacates the seat. This nominal place is in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the recipient usually resigns immediately after appointment.—Council of Five Hundred. See council.—Great hundred, long hundred, in old reckoning, six score; 120. It was legal for balks, deals, eggs, spars, stone, etc. "The technical meaning attached by merchants to the word hundred, associated with certain objects, was six score—a usage which is commemorated, though perhaps in too sweeping and general a form, in the popular distich:

Five score of men, money, and pins,
Six score of all other things."
Peacock, Encyc. Metropolitana, I. 381.

Old Hundred, properly Old Hundredth, a celebrated tune set in England about the middle of the sixteenth century to Kethe's version of the 100th Psalm, and marked "Old Hundredth" in Tate and Brady's new version in 1696, as being retained from the old version. The earliest extant copy of the tune is in the Genevan psalter of 1554, where it is set to Beza's version of the 134th Psalm; but there is evidence that it was of earlier origin, and was originally a popular tune set to words of a light, gay character.

II. a. [Strictly a collective noun; it is always preceded by a definitive, usually an article or a numeral, and the following noun is, historically, a genitive partitive—a hundred of men, a hundred of dollars, etc.] One more than ninety-nine; ten times ten: as, a hundred men; two hundred dollars; a hundred thousand times. —The Hundred Days, the closing period of the first Emperor Napoleon's career in France in 1815, after his escape from Elba. The reckonings of the time are various, none amounting to exactly 100 days. The nearest is that from March 13th, when Napoleon was joined by Ney with his army, to June 22d, the date of his abdication after the battle of Waterloo, making inclusively 102 days; but the most exact reckoning is that of his actual second reign, dating from his reëntry into Paris, and making 95 days (March 20th to June 22d).

hundredal (hun'drĕd-al), a. [< hundred + -al.] Pertaining to or involving the organization of a hundred. See hundred, n., 2.

The ancient towns in demesne of the crown either possessed a hundredal jurisdiction at the time of the Conquest or obtained "sac and soc" by grant from the crown.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 485.

hundred-court (hun'drĕd-kōrt), n. In England, a court held for the inhabitants of a hundred.

The constant recurrence of the number of twenty-four in this connexion may possibly imply an early connexion with the jury system, and the "jurati" of the early communes, which again must have been connected with the system of the hundred court. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 488.

hundreder (hun'drĕd-ėr), n. [< hundred + -er[1].] 1. An inhabitant or a freeholder in a hundred. —2. hunting-coat (hun'ting-kōt), n. A coat worn by huntsmen, usually of some distinctive color, as scarlet or green.

hunting-cog (hun'ting-kog), n. In mach., an extra cog in that one of two cog-wheels which is thus cut with one tooth more than it would have if the numbers of teeth on the two wheels were to be in a certain ratio to each other. Thus, for example, if a shaft is required to revolve three times as fast as its driving-shaft, 72 and 24 are a pair of numbers for teeth that would effect this result; and such numbers would suit a watchmaker, one being a multiple of the other; but the millwright would add one tooth to the larger wheel (the hunting-cog), and thus obtain 73 and 24, which numbers are prime to each other and yet are very nearly in the desired ratio. In the pair of wheels whose numbers are so obtained, any two teeth which meet in the first revolution are distant by one in the second, by two in the third, and so on; so that one tooth may be said to hunt the other, whence the name. The object of adding the hunting-cog is to effect a change of contact between teeth in consecutive revolutions. (Willis.)

hurdy-gurdy (hėr'di-gėr'di), n. [A riming for-★mula, appar. in imitative description of the sound of the instrument. Cf. hirdy-girdy.] 1. A musical instrument shaped somewhat like a lute, having four or more strings, two of which are tuned a fifth apart for the production of a drone-bass, and the other two in unison, but so arranged that they can be shortened by pressing finger-keys connected with an apparatus of tangents not unlike that of the clavichord. Additional strings, when present, are intended to reinforce the tone by sympathetic vibration. The strings are sounded by the revolution against them of a rosined wheel turned by a crank for the left hand. The keys are played by the right hand. The hurdy-gurdy is a rustic instrument, its tone being harsh and its artistic manipulation exceedingly limited. It is known to have existed in the ninth century, and was fashionable for a time in the eighteenth century, but is now played only by street musicians. A large variety called the organistrum was intended for two performers, one of whom simply turned the wheel. Other names are lira rustica, vielle, rota, and bauernleier.

The Italian boy delights all the ears of those who hear with his hurdy-gurdy. W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 54.

Shall we debase the soul by liking things that can be ground out by hurdy-gurdies?
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 961.

Wherein the acorn cradled.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2.

The seed, to shut the wastefull Sparrows out,
(In Haruest) hath a stand of Pikes about,
And Chaffie Husks in hollow Cods inclose it.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

Fruit of all kinds, in coat
Rough, or smooth rind, or bearded husk, or shell.
Milton, P. L., v. 342.

Through husks that, dry and sere, Unfolded from their ripened charge, shone out the yellow ear. Whittier, The Huskers.

[The "husks" mentioned in the parable of the prodigal son were carob-pods, which are long, thin, and husky, but contain much mucilaginous and saccharine matter, and are fed to domestic animals in Syria and elsewhere.

And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat. Luke xv. 16.]

2. Something resembling a husk, or serving the purpose of husks, as the membranous covering of an insect, or (sometimes) the shells of oysters.

This [chrysalis] also in its turn dies; its dead and brittle husk falls to pieces, and makes way for the appearance of the fly or moth. Paley, Nat. Theol., xix.

To-day I saw the dragon-fly
Come from the wells where he did lie.
An inner impulse rent the veil
Of his old husk: from head to tail
Came out clear plates of sapphire mail.
Tennyson, Two Voices.

3. Figuratively, the outer covering of anything; that which incloses or conceals the reality or the essential part; hence, in the plural, refuse; waste.

The very husks and shells of sciences, all the kernel being forced out and expulsed.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 243.

And your fair show shall suck away their souls,
Leaving them but the shales and husks of men.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 2.

Decrees of councils, elaborate treatises of theologians, creeds, liturgies, and canons, are all but the husks of religious history. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 120.

4. The frame which supports a run of millstones. — Capillary husk, an envelop or investment of capillaries in the spleen. = Syn. 1. Hull, etc. See skin, n.

Hallberger's Illus. Mag., 1876, p. 686.

husking-bee (hus′king-bē), n. Same as husking, 2. [U. S.]

The shining floor suggests the flail-beat of autumn, that pleasantest of monotonous sounds, and the later husking-bee, where the lads and lasses sit round laughingly busy under the swinging lantern.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 276.

husking-peg (hus′king-peg), n. Same as husking-pin.

husking-pin (hus′king-pin), n. A pin or claw worn upon the hand to assist in tearing open the shuck when husking Indian corn.

husky1 (hus′ki), a. [< *husk*1 + *-y*1.] Abounding with, consisting of, or resembling husks; hence, poor, unprofitable, etc.

Most have found
A husky harvest from the grudging ground.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, i. 314.

★ husky2 (hus′ki), a. [A var. (after *husk*3) of E. dial. hasky, dry, rough, unpleasant, hask, dry, rough, harsh, parched: see *hask*1, harsk, harsh. According to Skeat, husky stands for husty* or hausty,* < *haust*1, *hoast, host*4, a dry cough.] Dry in the throat; hoarse; harsh; sounding roughly: said of the voice or utterance.

The priest was a dry old man, with a husky and broken voice, and he proceeded as if all feeling had left his soul long ago. C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 45.

But the voices sank yet lower, sank to husky tones of fear.
Whittier, Garrison of Cape Ann.

★ Husky3 (hus′ki), n.; pl. Huskies (-kiz). [A corruption of Eskimo.] An Eskimo; also, the Eskimo language; also [l. c.], an Eskimo dog.

The original Husky has always been an animal requiring firm treatment, naturally dangerous, and to a great extent devoid of affection.
Colonial and Indian Exhibitions (1886), p. 75.

huso (hū′sō), n. [NL., < OHG. hūso, MHG. hūse, hūsen, G. hausen = D. huizen, MD. huyzen, the huso: see isinglass, which is a corruption of MD. huyzen-blas, 'huso-bladder.'] 1. The great sturgeon, Acipenser huso, of the rivers falling into the Black and Caspian seas, abounding especially in Russia. See sturgeon. — 2. [cap.] A genus of such fishes.

huss (hus), v. i. [A var. of hiss; cf. huzz.] To hiss; whistle, as the wind.

When once we come within a Mile, more or less, of the Cape and stand off to Sea, as soon as we get without it we find such a hussing Breez that sometimes we are not able to ply against it. Dampier, Voyages, II. iii. 38.

hussar (hu-zär′), n. [= F. hussard = Sp. húsar, husaro = Pg. hussar = It. ussaro = D. huzaar = Dan. Sw. husar = G. husar = Bohem. Pol. hūsar, < Hung. huszár, orig. a freebooter, < OServ. husar, gusar, hursar, gursar, kursar (OBulg. kurŭsarĭ, MGr. κουρσάρης, Turkish kursan), < Italian corsaro, corsare, a freebooter: see corsair.] A member of a class of light cavalry originating in Hungary in the middle ages, and now forming part of most European armies. The Hungarian hussars were famed for their activity and courage. Their dress was semi-oriental, and has set the type of uniform for the hussars of other nations. The latter are conspicuous for their fantastic dress, of which important parts have been the dolman and busby. Of late years the dolman has been abandoned, and the hussar uniform is distinguished by brilliant colors, elaborate braidings, etc.

I was about as perfect a type of the hussar as need be. My jacket seemed to fit tighter — my pelisse hung more jauntily — my shako sat more saucily on one side of my head. Lever, Maurice Tiernay, viii.

hussif1 (huz′if), n. [Assimilated form of *housewife*1 (ME. huswife) = *housewife*1: see *housewife*1 and *hussy*1.] A housewife.

hussif2 (huz′if), n. [Also written huzzif; an alteration, simulating *hussif*1 for *housewife*1, of hussy[2], which has on the other hand attracted hussif[1] into the form hussy[1]: see hussy[2], hussy[1].] Same as hussy[2].

Hussite (hus'īt), n. [< late ML. Hussitæ, pl. The name Huss, or more prop. Hus, is an abbr., adopted by Huss himself (about 1396), of his full name (Johann) Hussinetz (so called from his native village Hussinetz).] A follower of John Huss of Bohemia, the religious reformer, who was burned in 1415. The Hussites organized themselves immediately afterward into a politico-religious party, and waged fierce civil war from 1419 to 1434, when they were overcome. They were divided in doctrine into radical and conservative sections, called Taborites and Calixtines; the former finally became merged with the Bohemian Brethren, and the latter partly with the Lutherans and partly with the Roman Catholics.

Of Brownist, Hussite, or of Calvinist, Arminian, Puritan, or Familist.
Taylor's Motto (1622). (Halliwell.)

The cardinal [Beaufort] had already forwarded to Chichele the papal bull under which he was commissioned to raise money for the Hussite crusade.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 334.

hussy[1] (huz'i), n.; pl. hussies (-iz). [Also written hussey, huzzy, and dial. huzz; a reduced form of hussif[1], huswife[1], housewife[1]: see housewife[1].] 1†. The mistress of the house: same as housewife[1].

"Dame, ye mon to the pluch [plow] to morne;
I salbe hussy, gif I may."
"Husband," quoth scho, "content am I."
Wyf of Auchtirmuchty (Child's Ballads, VIII. 117).

2. A pert, wilful woman or girl; a frolicsome or mischievous girl; a quean; a jade; a wench: used either in reproach or jocosely.

Now you think me a corrupt Hussey.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, i. 1.

Meet me in the evening and I'll give you an answer to this. So, hussy, take a kiss beforehand, to put you in mind.
Sheridan, The Rivals, ii. 2.

hussy[2] (huz'i), n.; pl. hussies (-iz). [Also written huzzy; usually regarded as a particular use of hussy[1] = huzzy = huswife[1] = housewife[1], but according to Skeat < Icel. hūsi, a case (comp. skæris-hūsi, a scissors-case), < hūs (= Norw. huss), a house, also a case, = AS. hūs, a house: see house[1].] A case for scissors, needles, thread, etc. Also housewife, hussif.

I went towards the pond, the maid following me, and dropt purposely my hussy; and when I came near the tiles I said, "Mrs. Anne, I have dropt my hussy."
Richardson, Pamela, I. 162.

hust†. An obsolete past participle of hush.

hustilment†, n. See hustlement.

husting (hus'ting), n. [< ME. husting (> OF. husteng), a council, < late AS. hūsting, a council (of Danes), < Icel. hūsthing, a council or meeting to which a king, earl, or captain summoned his people or guardsmen, < hūs (= AS. hūs, E. house[1]) + thing, a thing; as a law term, an assembly, meeting, a general term for any public meeting, esp. for purposes of legislation; a parliament, including courts of law; = AS. and E. thing: see house[1] and thing.] 1. A public meeting for conference; a council; specifically, a court: now usually in the plural, hustings, used also as singular. Courts so called were formerly held in many cities of England, as Great Yarmouth, Lincoln, York, and Norwich, and are still held in London, before the mayor, recorder, and sheriffs. They formerly had exclusive authority in all real and mixed actions for the recovery of land within the city, except ejectment, but their jurisdiction has fallen into comparative desuetude. In Virginia, the municipal courts established in cities of over 5,000 inhabitants were at one time called hustings courts.

A husting court (for the purpose of a city of London school) was held in 1885, and again in 1888.
Academy (London), June 1, 1889, p. 374.

[By Henry the First's charter to London] the ancient assemblies, husting, folk-motes, ward-motes, are to be kept up. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 314.

Now the idea of representation begins to work in the National Council — the Sheriff of each Shire is directed to send up a certain number of freeholders, or royal tenants, to talk with the King. These are chosen by the free votes of their fellows at the Shire-moot or Hustings, as it was called later. A. Buckland, Nat. Institutions, p. 11.

2. pl. (also as singular). A temporary platform on which nominations of members of Parliament were made, and from which a candidate addressed his constituency. Since the passing of the Ballot Act of 1872 the use of hustings has been discontinued, but the word is still used with reference to any platform from which electioneering speeches are delivered. [Great Britain.]

I stood on the hustings, . . . less like a candidate than an unconcerned spectator of a publick meeting.
Burke, Speech at Bristol.

That so, when the rotten hustings shake
In another month to his brazen lies,
A wretched vote may be gain'd. Tennyson, Maud, vi.

He was . . . a second-rate hustings orator.
Disraeli, quoted in Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 513.

Hustings court, in Richmond and other cities of Virginia, a court having a criminal jurisdiction nearly exclusive as to offenses committed within the city limits, and a jurisdiction in many other cases, civil and criminal, concurrent with the circuit court, but locally limited.

★ hustle (hus'l), v.; pret. and pp. hustled, ppr. hustling. [< D. hutselen, shake, jolt, freq. of hutsen, hotsen, shake, jog, jolt, > ult. She saw a blue-jay washing itself, ducking its crest, and hustling the water with its wings. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 2.

And then
Was hustled by the sullen baffled men
Who shouldered past him back into the hall.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 352.

A beggar woman hustled the duchess as she was standing astonished because her maid had left her to carry her own bag. Froude, Sketches, p. 42.

When night after night a ministry is hustled and jostled in argument; when its members are unable to hold their own in the fiery ordeal of House of Commons interrogation, . . . their end is not far off. Edinburgh Rev., CLXV. 272.

II. intrans. 1. To push or crowd; move about with difficulty, as in a crowd; shuffle or shamble hurriedly.

Leaving the king, who had hustled along the floor with his dress wofully ill-arrayed. Scott.

Every theatre had its footmen's gallery; an army of the liveried race hustled round every chapel-door. Thackeray.

2. To make haste; move or act energetically: as, come, hustle now. [Colloq., U. S.]—3. To shake up the halfpence in the game of pitch and hustle. See below.

The owner of the nearest halfpenny claims the privilege to hustle first. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 370.

Pitch and hustle, an old game in which the contestants pitch halfpence at a mark, to see who can come the nearest to it. The halfpence are then collected, shaken together, and deposited on the ground, and that player who has pitched one of his halfpence nearest the mark takes all those which turn head upward. The remaining halfpence are again shaken together and deposited on the ground, and the player who pitched a halfpenny next nearest the mark takes all that turn head upward. This continues until all the halfpence are taken. Strutt.

hustle-cap (hus'l-kap), n. Same as pitch and hustle. See hustle, v. i.

Squandered what little money they could procure at hustle-cap and chuck-farthing.

The name Huggins is similarly derived from ME. Hugyn, Hugon, ‹ OF. Hugon, Hugo, another form of Hugh: see Huguenot.] A genus of small perennial and annual cruciferous plants of Europe and Asia, with pinnately divided leaves and small white flowers. They are chiefly alpine in habitat. H. petræa, an annual, grows on rocks and walls in England and Wales.

Hutchinsonian (huch-in-sō′ni-an), n. and a. [The surname Hutchinson, ME. Huchynson, Hochinson, is a patronymic equiv. to Hutchins, i. e. Hutchin's son: see Hutchinsia.] I. n. 1. One who held the views of John Hutchinson (1674–1737), a secular English writer on theology and natural philosophy. He and his followers interpreted the Bible mystically, regarded it as an infallible source of science and philosophy, opposed the Newtonian system, and laid great stress on the importance of the Hebrew language. The Hutchinsonian school existed till the nineteenth century.

2. In Amer. hist., a follower of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson (died 1643), an antinomian teacher, in the early years of the colony of Massachusetts Bay.

II. a. Pertaining or relating to John Hutchinson or Anne Hutchinson, or to the doctrines of either of them.

Hutchinsonianism (huch-in-sō′ni-an-izm), n. [‹ Hutchinsonian + -ism.] The system of doctrine or thought taught by or derived from either John Hutchinson or Anne Hutchinson. See Hutchinsonian, n.

Hutchins's goose. See goose.

hutet, v. A Middle English form of hoot.

hutment (hut′ment), n. [‹ hut[1], v., + -ment.] Accommodation in huts; housing. [Rare.]

On foreign stations the only important sanitary works appear to be a contribution of £300 towards the drainage of Cape Town, . . . and £14,230 for hutment for increased garrison at Malta. The Lancet, No. 3422, p. 650.

hutte, v. A Middle English form of hit[1].

Huttonian (hu-tō′ni-an), a. In geol., relating to ★the views and theories of James Hutton (1726–1797). Hutton wrote and published voluminously in various departments of natural science and metaphysics, but when the term Huttonian is used it is generally with reference to his work in geology. The most important feature of Hutton's theories was his attempt to explain the former changes of the earth's crust by the aid of natural agencies exclusively. In opposition to Werner, he maintained that granite and basalt were rocks which had undergone fusion by subterranean heat, and this view and others held by him were for some years the subject of violent controversies.

hut-urn (hut′ėrn), n. A type of cinerary urn of pottery characteristic of primitive Italic peoples, although simpler forms are found in central Europe. The urn has the shape of a circular cabin or hut, with a conical roof, imitating a rude structure in osiers plastered with clay. These urns are found in all the sites of archaic Italic civilization, as at Vetulonia, Cività Castellana, in the oldest tombs of Corneto, in the ancient necropolis of Torre del Mordillo near Sybaris, and notably in the cemetery of Alba Longa, beneath the strata of eruptive deposits from the volcanoes of Latium. The form persisted in the Roman temples of Vesta, which were always circular and with a conical roof, like the primeval huts of the race. Sometimes called house-urn.

huvette, n. [F., ‹ OF. huvette, huveste, a kind of hat used by soldiers: cf. huve, an ornament for the head, a woman's head-gear: see houve.] Same as humette[2].

hux (huks), v. t. [Origin obscure; perhaps transposed from husk*, ‹ husk, a certain fish: see husk[2].] To fish for, as pike, with hooks and lines fastened to floating bladders.

huxter, n. See huckster.

Huygenian (hī-gē′ni-an), a. Of or pertaining to Christian Huygens (often written Huyghens), a Dutch natural philosopher and mathematician (1629–95). Also Huyghenian.—Huygenian eyepiece. See eyepiece.

huz (huz), pron. A vulgar pronunciation of us. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

He hasna settled his account . . . wi huz for sax weeks. Scott, Antiquary, I. 318.

What need we care about his subsistence, sae lang as he asks nae thing frae huz, ye ken. Scott, Rob Roy, xxiv.

huzz, v. i. [Imitative: cf. buzz[1] and hizz, hiss, whizz.] To buzz; hum; murmur.

If the fire then burne in the chimney pale, and keepe therewith a huzzing noise, wee find by experience that it forsheweth tempest and stormie weather. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xviii. 35.

But summun 'ull come ater meä mayhap wi' 'is kittle o' steäm Huzzin' an' maäzin' the blessed feälds wi' the Divil's oän teäm. Tennyson, Northern Farmer, Old Style.

huzza, huzzah (hu-zä′ or -zā′), interj. [‹ G. hussa, another form of hurrah: see hurrah.] Variants of hurrah. Sometimes huzzay.

You begin to be something too old for us, we are for the brisk Huzza's of Seventeen or Eighteen. Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, i.

"There are woodcocks for supper," says my lord, "Huzzay!" Thackeray, Henry Esmond, II. vii.

The company rose twice and manifested their approbation by nine huzzas. Bancroft, Hist. Const., I. 120.

huzza (hu-zä′ or -zā′), v. I. intrans. Same as hurrah.

With that I huzzaed, and took a jump across the table. Tatler, No. 45.

II. trans. Same as hurrah.

He was huzzaed into the court by several thousand of weavers and clothiers. Addison.

huzzy, n. See hussy[1].

hw-. The original form, in early Middle English and Anglo-Saxon, of the consonant sequence now written wh-. For all words so beginning, see under wh-.

hwang (hwäng), n. See fung-hwang.

hy[1]†, a. An obsolete spelling of high.

hy[2]†, v. An obsolete spelling of hie.

hy[3] (hī), interj. See hi.

hyacinet, n. A corrupt form of hyacinth.

Deepe empurpled as the Hyacine. Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 54.

★hyacinth (hī′a-sinth), n. [In older E. jacinth, jacint (see jacinth), ‹ OF. hyacinthe, ‹ L. hyacinthus, ‹ Gr. ὑάκινθος, the hyacinth (a plant-name appar. comprehending the blue iris, the gladiolus, and the larkspur); also a precious stone of blue color (prob. not the mod. hyacinth, but perhaps the sapphire); origin obscure; according to one conjecture, connected with ἰον (Fιον*) = L. vio-la, violet. Doublet jacinth, jacint.] 1. An ornamental bulbous plant of the genus Hyacinthus (H. orientalis), of the family Liliaceæ. A native of the Levant, growing in abundance about Aleppo and Bagdad. The root is a tunicated bulb; the leaves are broad and green; the scape is erect, bearing numerous often drooping bell-shaped flowers of almost all colors, and both single- and double-flowered. The hyacinth appears first to have been cultivated as a garden-flower by the Dutch about the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was introduced into England about the end of that century, and is now one of the most popular of cultivated bulbous plants. [The so-called yellow sickness of the hyacinth is produced by a parasitic bacterium which occurs as yellow slimy masses in the vessels. "In the resting bulb the bacteria are confined to the vascular bundles of the bulb-scales; at flowering time they are found also in the leaves, and not in the vessels only, but in the parenchyma also, where they fill the intercellular spaces, [and] destroy the cells." (De Bary, Comp. Morph. and Biol., p. 482.)]

Hyacinth (Hyacinthus orientalis).
a, Flower cut longitudinally; b, fruit cut transversely; c, seed cut longitudinally, showing the embryo.

The letter'd hyacinths of darksome hue,
And the sweet violet, a sable blue.
Fawkes, tr. of Idylls of Theocritus, x.

Sheets of hyacinth
That seem'd the heavens upbreaking thro' the earth.
Tennyson, Guinevere.

2. By transfer, a plant of some other genus. The California hyacinths are liliaceous plants of the genera Hookera and Hesperoscordum, often called Brodiæa; the Cape hyacinth, Hyacinthus corymbosus and H. brevifolius; the fair-haired hyacinth, Muscari comosum; the grape-hyacinth, or globe-hyacinth, the genus Muscari; the lily-hyacinth, Scilla Lilio-Hyacinthus; the hyacinth of Peru, Scilla Peruviana; the star-hyacinth, Scilla amœna; the starch-hyacinth, Muscari racemosum; the tassel-hyacinth, Muscari comosum; the wild hyacinth, Quamasia hyacinthina (see the supplement).

3. (a) Among the ancients, a gem of bluish-violet color, supposed to be the sapphire. (b) In modern usage, a gem of a reddish-orange color which is a variety of the mineral zircon. Some varieties of garnet and topaz also receive this name.

Dishes of agat set in gold, and studded
With emeralds, sapphires, hyacinths, and rubies.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

4. In her., the tincture tenney or tawny when blazoning is done by colors of precious stones. See blazon.—5. In ornith., a purple gallinule, as of the genus Ionornis or Porphyrio; a sultan.—Hyacinth beans. See Egyptian beans, under bean[1].

hyacinthian (hī-a-sin′thi-an), a. Same as hyacinthine.

hyacinthine (hī-a-sin′thin), a. [‹ L. hyacinthinus, ‹ Gr. ὑακίνθινος, hyacinthine, ‹ ὑάκινθος, hyacinth: see hyacinth.] 1. Made or consisting of hyacinth; resembling hyacinth in color or odor.

Hyacinthine locks
Round from his parted forelock manly hung Clustering. Milton, P. L., iv. 301.

Her lips more fragrant than the summer air;
And sweet as Scythian musk her hyacinthine hair.
Sir W. Jones, Palace of Fortune.

They [Manhattan Island garnets] do not . . . possess the hyacinthine hue of the Alaskan examples, and are less translucent. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 311.

2. Very beautiful or attractive: in allusion to Hyacinthus, a youth fabled to have been loved by Apollo.

The hyacinthine boy, for whom Morn well might break and April bloom.
Emerson, Threnody.

Hyacinthus (hī-a-sin′thus), n. [NL., ‹ L. hyacinthus: see hyacinth.] A genus of liliaceous bulbous plants, including about 30 species, natives of central Europe, Asia, and Africa. It is characterized by having the perianth infundibuliform-campanulate, not constricted at the throat, the lobes shorter, or rarely longer, than the tube, and the stamens fixed in the tube or throat, with slender filaments dilated at the base. H. orientalis has been long celebrated for the endless varieties which culture has produced from it. One of these is the Roman hyacinth, a small white-blossomed species, often grown as an early spring flower; there is also a pale-blue Roman hyacinth, the true Hyacinthus Romanus of Linnæus. H. amethystinus is the amethyst or Spanish hyacinth. See cut under hyacinth.

Hyades (hī′a-dēz), n. pl. [L., ‹ Gr. Ὑάδες (sing. Ὑάς not used), prob. ‹ ὗς (cf. LGr. συάς, a sow) = L. sus, a pig, swine, like the equiv. L. suculæ, the Hyades, lit. 'piglings,' ‹ sus, a pig: see Sus, sow[2], and swine. But the ancient derivation was ‹ Gr. ὑειν, rain, whence Virgil calls them Pluviæ, 'rainy' (see pluvious). See also the def.] 1. In astron., a group of about seven stars, of which the principal is Aldebaran, in the head of the Bull, supposed by the ancients to indicate the approach of rainy weather when they rose with the sun. In Greek mythology the Hyades were originally nymphs who nursed the infant Bacchus, and were transformed into stars in compassion for their incessant weeping for the fate of their brother, who was torn to pieces by a wild beast. Also Hyads.

Thro' scudding drifts the rainy Hyades
Vext the dim sea. Tennyson, Ulysses.

2. [Used as a singular.] In entom., a genus of lepidopterous insects. Boisduval.

Hyads (hī′adz), n. pl. Same as Hyades, 1.

Then sailors quarter'd heaven, and found a name
For every fix'd and every wandering star;
The Pleiads, Hyads, and the Northern Car.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, i. 207.

Hyæna (hī-ē′nä), n. [NL., ‹ L. hyæna, hyena: see hyena.] 1. (a) The typical genus of the family Hyænidæ. There are two living species of the genus in its restricted use: the common striped hyena, H. striata, and the brown hyena, H. brunnea. The spotted hyena is H. crocuta, or Crocuta maculata. The genus is now confined to the warmer parts of the old world, but the cave-hyena, H. spelæus, formerly inhabited much of Europe, its remains being now found in caverns in Germany, France, and England. See cut under hyena. (b) [l. c.] The Linnean specific name of Canis hyæna, equivalent to the modern family Hyænidæ.—2. In ichth., a genus of fishes. Oken, 1816.—3. [l. c.] See hyena.

Hyænarctidæ (hī-e-närk′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Hyænarctos + -idæ.] A family of fossil arctoid mammals, the type of which is the genus Hyænarctos.

Hyænarctos (hī-e-närk′tos), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑαινα, hyena, + ἄρκτος, a bear: see arctic.] A genus of fossil bear-like carnivorous mammals from the Miocene and Pliocene, referred to the Ursidæ, or made the type of a family Hyænarctidæ. The genus, established by Cautley and Falconer, is equivalent to Agriotherium of Wagner, Sivalarctos and Amphiarctos of De Blainville, and Hemicyon of Lartet. Fossil remains referred to this genus have been named H. hemicyon and H. insignis.

hyænic, a. See hyenic.

Hyænidæ (hī-en′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Hyæna + -idæ.] A family of Feræ fissipedia, belonging to the series Æluroidea hyæniformia; the hyenas. They have 3 incisors and 1 canine on each side above and below, 4 premolars in each upper and 3 in each lower half-jaw, and 1 molar on each side above and below—in all 34 teeth, which are very strong. The large molars are close together; the upper true molars are reduced in size, and tubercular; and the lower true molars and last upper premolar are sectorial. The feet are digitigrade, with blunt non-retractile claws; the tail is short and bushy; the eyes and ears are prominent; and the tongue is rough with prickles. There are two genera, Hyæna and Crocuta. With Hyænidæ proper is sometimes associated the genus Proteles, now usually made the type of a family Protelidæ. See hyena.

hyæniform, a. See hyeniform.

Hyæniformia (hī-en-i-fôr'mi-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Hyæna + L. forma, form.] A group or series of Æluroidea, constituted by the families Hyænidæ and Protelidæ, having 34 or 32 teeth, no tubercular true molar in the lower jaw, no septum of the auditory bulla, and digitigrade feet.

hyænine, a. See hyenine.

Hyænodon (hī-en'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑαινα, hyena, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals of the Eocene and Miocene, of uncertain systematic position. They had apparently forty-two teeth, of a canine type; the fourth upper premolar and first lower molar were sectorial, and all the succeeding teeth were also sectorial, but not tuberculate as in existing carnivores. In H. leptorhynchus, for example, the last lower molar is the largest and most completely sectorial of the series. This species is described by Boyd Dawkins, from the Upper Eocene of Hordwell. Many other species have been found in both Europe and America. The animals were about as large as leopards.

Hyænodontidæ (hī-en-ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyænodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of extinct carnivorous mammals, represented by the genus Hyænodon.

hyænoid, a. See hyenoid.

Hyalæa, n. See Hyalea, 1. Lamarck, 1799.

Hyalæidæ (hī-ą-lē'i-dē), n. pl. See Hyaleidæ. Cantraine.

Hyalea (hī-ā'lē-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑάλεος, of glass, < ὕαλος, glass: see hyaline.] 1. The genus of pteropods which gives name to the family Hyaleidæ: a synonym of Cavolinia. Also wrongly spelled Hyalæa. Lamarck, 1801; Cuvier, 1817. See cut under Cavolinia.—2. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Guenée, 1854.

Hyaleacea (hī-ā-lē-ā'sē-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Hyalea + -acea.] A group of pteropods, including the genus Hyalea. Also wrongly spelled Hyalæacea. Menke, 1828.

Hyaleidæ (hī-ą-lē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyalea + -idæ.] A family of thecosomatous pteropods, taking name from the genus Hyalea; the glass-shells: synonymous with Cavoliniidæ. Also (wrongly) Hyalæidæ and Hyalidæ.

hyalescence (hī-ą-les'ens), n. [< hyalescen(t) + -ce.] The process of becoming, or the quality or state of being, glassy in texture or transparency; glassiness.

hyalescent (hī-ą-les'ent), a. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + -escent.] Becoming hyaline; exhibiting hyalescence; hyaloid.

hyalin (hī'ą-lin), n. [< LL. hyalīnus, < Gr. ὑάλινος, of glass: see hyaline.] The chief nitrogenous constituent of hydatid cysts, containing about 5 per cent. of nitrogen. When boiled with sulphuric acid it is said to yield 50 per cent. of its weight of a dextrorotatory sugar. Gamgee.

hyaline (hī'ą-lin), a. and n. [= F. hyaline = Sp. hialino = Pg. hyalino, < LL. hyalīnus, < Gr. ὑάλινος, of glass, < ὕαλος, also ὕελος, glass, a word said to be of Egyptian origin; glass was first made in Egypt.] I. a. Glassy; resembling glass; consisting of glass; crystalline; transparent: as, the hyaline or crystalline lens of the eye. In anatomy the word is specifically applied to the purest or most typical kind of cartilage, as that of the fetal skeleton, articular ends of adult bones, etc., as distinguished from fibrocartilage and other varieties.—Hyaline cartilage. See cartilage.—Hyaline degeneration, in pathol., transformation of tissues into a glassy substance resembling lardaceous tissue, but not giving its chemical reactions. It affects the walls of the blood-vessels, involuntary muscular fiber, and apparently interstitial connective tissue. Also called vitreous, fibrinous, and waxy degeneration.—Hyaline layer, Kölliker's name of the innermost layer of a hair-follicle.

II. n. 1. A glassy or transparent substance or surface.

> Witness this new-made world, another heaven,
> From heaven-gate not far, founded in view
> On the clear hyaline, the glassy sea.
> Milton, P. L., vii. 619.

Specifically—(a) The hyaloid membrane of the eye. See hyaloid. (b) Hyaline cartilage. See cartilage. (c) A pellucid substance which determines the spontaneous division of cells or originates cell-nuclei; hyaloplasm.

hyalite (hī'ą-līt), n. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + *-ite*2. Cf. Gr. ὑαλῖτις, of glass.] A pellucid variety of opal, resembling colorless gum or resin. It is white, sometimes with a shade of yellow, blue, or green, and occurs in small botryoidal incrustations, especially on basaltic rocks. Also called Muller's glass.

hyalithe (hī'ą-lith), n. [Contr. < Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + λίθος, stone.] A strong, dark-colored glass, sometimes used as a substitute for porcelain.

hyalitis (hī-ą-lī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕαλος, glass (with ref. to the vitreous humor), + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the vitreous humor.

hyalo-. [< Gr. ὑαλο-ς, glass: see hyaline.] An element in some scientific compounds, meaning 'glass.' As a prefix to names of rocks, it indicates that the forms thus designated are in a more or less completely vitrified condition: thus, hyalo-andesite, hyalo-basalt, hyalo-trachyte, etc.

hyalograph (hī-al'ō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument for etching on a transparent surface.

hyalography (hī-ą-log'rą-fi), n. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The art of ★writing or engraving on glass.

hyaloid (hī'ą-loid), a. and n. [< LL. hyaloides, glass-green, < Gr. ὑαλοειδής, like glass, < ὕαλος, glass, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Hyaline; transparent; glassy.—Hyaloid canal. See *canal*1.—Hyaloid membrane, the capsule of the vitreous humor of the eye; a delicate, pellucid, and nearly structureless membrane, investing the vitreous body except in front, where it is continuous with the suspensory ligament of the crystalline lens. See second cut under *eye*1.

II. n. The hyaloid membrane.

hyaloiditis (hī″ą-loi-dī'tis), n. [NL., < hyaloid + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the hyaloid membrane.

hyalomelan (hī-ą-lom'e-lan), n. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + μέλας (μέλαν-), black.] One of the names formerly given by mineralogists to glassy varieties of basalt, under the idea that these were simple homogeneous minerals. See tachylyte and obsidian.

Hyalonema (hī″ą-lō-nē'mą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + νῆμα, a thread.] The typical genus of the family Hyalonemidæ.

hyalonemid (hī″ą-lō-nē'mid), n. A glass-sponge of the family Hyalonemidæ.

Hyalonemidæ (hī″ą-lō-nem'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyalonema + -idæ.] A family of hexactinelline sponges, or glass-sponges, of the order Silicoidea, and typified by the genus Hyalonema, having a long stem of fine silicious threads, at one end of which is the sponge proper; the glass-rope sponges. There are several other genera, as Pheronema, Stylocalyx, and Poliopogon. Also Hyalonematidæ.

Hyalonema sieboldi, reduced.

hyaloplasm (hī'ą-lō-plazm), n. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + πλάσμα, anything formed: see plasm.] A clear, homogeneous protoplasm; hyaline.

> The subdivisions within the fibre are the "primitive tubules," and these contain the "hyaloplasm," which is the true nervous substance.
> Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.

> A distinct granular condition becomes apparent in what was the homogeneous hyaloplasm.
> Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI. (ii. 199.

hyaloplasmic (hī″ą-lō-plaz'mik), a. Having the character of hyaloplasm.

hyalopterous (hī-ą-lop'te-rus), a. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + πτερόν, wing.] Having hyaline or transparent wings, as an insect.

hyalosiderite (hī″ą-lō-sid'e-rīt), n. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + σιδερίτης, of iron, < σίδηρος, iron: see siderite.] A brown ferruginous variety of olivin or chrysolite.

hyalospermous (hī″ą-lō-spėr'mus), a. [< Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + σπέρμα, seed.] Having transparent seeds. [Rare.]

Hyalospongia (hī″ą-lō-spon'ji-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + σπογγιά, a sponge.] A superfamily group of sponges, equivalent to Hexactinellidæ or Hyalonemidæ in a broad sense; the glass-sponges. In Claus's system of classification the Hyalospongia are the fourth order of the class Spongia, characterized as sponges with a firm, often hyaline, latticework of 6-rayed silicious spicules, which may be cemented together by a stratified silicious substance.

hyalotekite (hī″ą-lō-tē'kīt), n. [Prop. hyalotecite*, < Gr. ὕαλος, glass, + τήκειν, melt, + *-ite*2.] A silicate of lead with barium and calcium, from Sweden. It occurs in white to gray crystalline masses, with a vitreous to greasy luster, and fuses easily to a clear glass.

Hyas (hī'as), n. [NL.: see Hyades.] A genus of birds: same as Cursorius.

Hyawa gum. See *gum*2.

hybernacle†, n. An obsolete form of hibernacle.

hybernate†, hybernation†. Obsolete forms of hibernate, hibernation.

Hyblæan (hi-blē'an), a. [< L. Hyblæus, < Hybla, Hyble, < Gr. Ὕβλη: see def.] Pertaining to Hybla, an ancient city on the coast of Sicily, north of Syracuse, celebrated for the honey produced on the neighboring hills. The honey of Hybla is sometimes incorrectly ascribed to a Mount Hybla. The city was closely connected and finally apparently identical with the later one of Megara (Megara Hyblæa). It was also called Hybla Minor, to distinguish it from another Sicilian town, Hybla Major.

Hybocodon (hī-bok'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑβός, humpbacked, + κώδων, a bell.] The typical genus of the family Hybocodonidæ. Agassiz, 1860.

Hybocodonidæ (hī-bok-ō-don'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hybocodon + -idæ.] A family of gymnoblastic hydroid hydrozoans, represented by the genus Hybocodon.

hybodont (hib'ō-dont), a. and n. [< Hybodus (hybodont-), q. v.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hybodontidæ. Also cladodont.

II. n. A fish of the genus Hybodus or family Hybodontidæ.

Hybodontes (hib-ō-don'tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑβός, humpbacked, ὑβος, a hump, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A group of fossil sharks, corresponding to the family Hybodontidæ. Agassiz.

hybodontid (hib-ō-don'tid), n. One of the Hybodontidæ.

Hybodontidæ (hib-ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hybodus (-dont-) + -idæ.] A family of fossil sharks, typified by the genus Hybodus. They are characterized by teeth with broad fixed bases, which have a large cusp or cone, and two or more lesser secondary cones on the sides. The fin-spines are barbed, and situated in front of each of the two dorsal fins; the skin is covered with sparse shagreen. The family prevailed throughout the Oölitic, Triassic, and Cretaceous periods. In Owen's system of classification the family, together with the Cestraciontidæ, composes the suborder Cestraphori of the order Plagiostomi. The species were very closely related to the Heterodontidæ or Cestraciontidæ, and are by some referred to that family.

Hybodus (hib'ō-dus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑβός, humpbacked, ὑβος, a hump, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Hybodontidæ. ★Agassiz.

hybrid (hī'brid or hib'rid), n. and a. [Formerly hybride; < F. hybride = Sp. híbrido = Pg. hybrido = It. ibrido, < L. hybrida, hibrida, ibrida, a mongrel, a hybrid. The spelling hybrida rests on the very doubtful assumption that the word is derived from Gr. ὑβρις (ὑβριδ-), insult, wantonness, outrage.] I. n. 1. The offspring or progeny of animals or plants of different varieties, species, or genera; a half-breed or cross-breed; a mongrel. Hybrid animals are more or less frequent according to the less or greater zoölogical difference of their parents. Thus, the commonest are those resulting from the union of opposite sexes of varieties of the same species; and these hybrids are in fact of much more frequent occurrence than has usually been supposed. Hybrids or half-breeds of the human race are among the best-known examples, and the occurrence of hybrids among plants is very frequent. The most familiar hybrids between distinct species are mules, bred between the horse and the ass. Hybrids between different genera are rare; but they occur, as in the case of the cross between the dog and the fox. The fertility of hybrids among themselves is as a rule proportionate to the nearness of their parents, fertile hybrids between varieties being common, those between species less so, those between genera least so. Hybrids between distinct species are commonly infertile, at least with one another, though they may propagate with an individual of the pure breed of either parent. The natural tendency is thus for hybrids to die out unless artificially kept up by repeated cross-breeding. But the degree of sterility is not always dependent solely upon the zoölogical affinity of the parents, for reciprocal hybrids of the same two species may differ in this respect. In botany a hybrid is an individual which results from the union of the male element of one species of plant with the female of another, a process frequently occurring in oaks, willows, etc. The resulting offspring resembles both parents, yet differs in certain more or less marked characters from either. Horticulturalists formerly believed that a graft established upon a plant might combine characters of this plant with those of the plant which produced the shoot used as a graft, or become a graft-hybrid; but there is no scientific support for this opinion. The ingrafted species retains its characteristics intact.

Hence—2. Anything which is a product or mixture of two heterogeneous things, or comes from two different sources, as a word formed of elements from two different languages. See II., 2.—Reciprocal hybrids, hybrids the sexes of whose respective parents are reversed. Thus, the mule of a stallion and a she-ass, and the mule of a jackass and a mare, are reciprocal hybrids.

II. a. 1. Produced from the union of opposite sexes of two different or distinct varieties, species, or genera; half-bred; cross-bred; mongrel. See I.

The mere fact that not only animals of distinct genera, but even those classed in distinct families—as the pheasant and the black grouse—sometimes produce hybrid offspring in a state of nature, is itself an argument against there being any constant infertility between the most closely allied species.
A. R. Wallace, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 311.

Hence—2. Of heterogeneous origin; having a mixed character; combining diverse elements, as a word formed from two different languages, architecture combining diverse styles, etc. Hybrid words of various kinds abound in English. Examples are bank-rupt, dis-belief, atone-ment, and eat-able, in which Teutonic and Latin elements are joined. In natural history hybrid names are generally condemned, though many have been retained in science; it is not regarded as an infringement of the laws of precedence to rectify or wholly reject them. A word bodily transferred from Greek to Latin and then taking the Latin inflections is not regarded as a hybrid; but if Greek and Latin inflections or Greek and Latin stems are mixed it is so regarded. Some hybrids have come into general use, and have been allowed to remain.—Hybrid porcelain, a ceramic ware which is not strictly hard porcelain like that of China, nor the soft-paste porcelain discovered in France, much used in Europe before the discovery of the secret of hard porcelain by Böttcher at Meissen. Quartz and a glassy frit enter into the composition of this ware, with but little kaolin.—Hybrid syllogism, an indirect syllogism.

hybridation (hī-bri- or hib-ri-dā′shọn), n. [< hybrid + -ation.] Same as hybridization. [Rare.]

The theory of hybridation advocated by some ostreiculturists. The American, V. 88.

★hybridisable, hybridisation, etc. See hybridizable, etc.

hybridism (hī′bri- or hib′ri-dizm), n. [< hybrid + -ism.] 1. The state or condition of being hybrid; the character of a hybrid. Also hybridity.

Until recently, the interest attaching to hybridism was almost entirely of a practical nature.
G. J. Romanes, Encyc. Brit., XII. 422.

2. The act of hybridizing; the production or formation of hybrids of any kind.

To tack on to a Gothic root a classical termination (and vice versa) is to be guilty of Hybridism. . . . Hybridism is the commonest fault that accompanies the introduction of new words. Latham, Eng. Lang., §§ 247, 248.

Inappropriate hybridism is checked by the Law of Sterility. H. Drummond, Natural Law in Spiritual World, [Pref., p. xiii.

hybridist (hī′bri- or hib′ri-dist), n. [< hybrid + -ist.] One who hybridizes. Quarterly Rev.

hybridity (hī- or hi-brid′i-ti), n. [< hybrid, a., + -ity.] Same as hybridism, 1.

The test of hybridity cannot be applied in one case in ten thousand. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 161.

The investigation of the whole subject of crossing and hybridity had shown that . . . crosses between slightly different varieties led to increased fertility.
The Century, XXV, 427.

hybridizable (hī′bri- or hib′ri-dī-za-bl), a. [< hybridize + -able.] Capable of hybridizing or of being hybridized; able to produce hybrid offspring by crossing with another species. Also spelled hybridisable.

Hybridizable genera are rarer than is generally supposed, even in gardens, where they are so often operated upon under circumstances most favourable to the production of hybrids. J. D. Hooker.

hybridization (hī″bri- or hib″ri-di-zā′shọn), n. [< hybridize + -ation.] The act or process of hybridizing, or the state of being hybridized; cross-fertilization; cross-breeding. See hybrid, n., 1. Also hybridisation.

For anything we can show to the contrary, many existing species may have had their origin in hybridisation.
Lond. Jour. Sci., CXXIV. 190.

hybridize (hī′bri- or hib′ri-dīz), v.; pret. and pp. hybridized, ppr. hybridizing. [< hybrid + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To cause to interbreed and thus produce hybrids.

Yet in some other genera [than Primula], species which are not heterostyled, and which in some respects appear not well adapted for hybrid-fertilisation, have likewise been largely hybridised.
Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 55.

Hence—2. To form or construct in a hybrid manner, as words.

II. intrans. To produce a hybrid or hybrids; cross or interbreed, as two different varieties or species of plants or animals.

Also spelled hybridise.

hybridizer (hī′bri- or hib′ri-dī-zėr), n. One who crosses different varieties or species, etc., to produce hybrids; a hybridist. Also spelled hybridiser.

The evidence from fertility adduced by different hybridisers. Darwin, Origin of Species (6th ed.), p. 237.

It is important to remark that hybridisers usually experiment with very distinct species.
A. R. Wallace, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 310.

hybridous (hī′bri- or hib′ri-dus), a. [< hybrid, n., + -ous.] Of hybrid character; heterogeneous. [Rare.]

No hybridous architecture or nondescript figures.
★ N. A. Rev., CXLI. 290.

hydatid (hī′dạ-tid), n. and a. [Cf. L. hydatis (-id-), a water-colored gem, < Gr. ὑδατίς (-ιδ-), a drop of water, a water-vesicle, hydatid, a gem, < ὕδωρ (ὑδατ-), water: see hydra, hydro-.] I. n. 1. In pathol., a cyst with aqueous contents found in the tissue, formed by a tænia in its larval state, especially in man by Tænia echinococcus. The name has also been applied loosely to various other cysts filled with a watery fluid. More fully called a false hydatid.

2. In zoöl., the encysted larval state of the wandered scolex of a tapeworm, especially of Tænia echinococcus. Its character was formerly misunderstood, and it was called Echinococcus hominis when occurring in man. Other true hydatids, in a zoölogical sense, are called cysticerci and cœnures. See echinococcus, cysticercus, cœnure, and cut under Tænia.

This remarkably minute parasite [the hydatigenous tapeworm, Tænia echinococcus], though not resident in man in its adult condition, is nevertheless in one of its larval stages of frequent occurrence in the human body. Whilst the full-grown creature seldom attains the fourth of an inch in length, the larvæ, on the other hand, acquire a prodigious size. The latter are familiarly known to the [medical] profession under the name of hydatids.
T. S. Cobbold, Tapeworms (1886), p. 55.

Hydatid of Morgagni, in anat., a name applied to the one or more small pedunculated growths which lie beside the globus major of the epididymis, and are formed mainly of connective tissue and blood-vessels. They are commonly regarded as the remains of Müller's duct.

II. a. In zoöl., encysted; being in the cystic state, as the larva of a tapeworm when it is a cysticercus, cœnure, or echinococcus.

hydatidiform (hī-dạ-tid′i-fôrm), a. [< Gr. ὑδατίς (-ιδ-), a hydatid, + L. forma, form.] Resembling or having the character of a hydatid. Also hydatiform.

They [tubes in the organ of Rosenmüller] are flexuous, of unequal calibre, and sometimes the seat of cystic or hydatidiform enlargements.
R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 29.

hydatidinous (hī-dạ-tid′i-nus), a. [< hydatid + -ine[1] + -ous.] Pertaining to or exhibiting one or more hydatids.

hydatiform (hī-dat′i-fôrm), a. Same as hydatidiform.

hydatigenous (hī-dạ-tij′e-nus), a. [< hydatid + -genous.] Bearing or producing hydatids: as, a hydatigenous tapeworm.

Hydatigenous formations connected with the chorion.
T. S. Cobbold.

Hydatina (hī-dat′i-nạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδάτινος, of water, watery, < ὕδωρ (ὑδατ-), water.] 1. A genus of mollusks. Schumacher, 1817.—2. A genus of rotifers, typical of the family Hydatinidæ, containing such species as H. senta, one of the best known of the wheel-animalcules. Ehrenberg, 1830. See cut under Rotifera.

Hydatina senta is a classical animal, because it was principally on this species that the illustrious Ehrenberg studied the anatomy of this group of animalcules. The broad body has only a very short foot-stalk, which is forked behind. The mouth is armed with two jaws and many teeth. There are no eye-specks whatsoever. The cuticle is delicate and soft. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 205.

Hydatinidæ (hī-dạ-tin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydatina, 2, + -idæ.] A family of schizotrochous rotifers, typified by the genus Hydatina. The trochal disk or wheel-organ is transverse and has ciliated prominences, the wreath is double, the trophi are malleate, and the foot is furcate. There are many genera besides Hydatina, such as Diglena, Notommata, and Monocerca.

hydatis (hī′dạ-tis), n. A hydatid.

hydatism (hī′dạ-tizm), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδατ-), water, + -ism.] In med., a sound produced by the motion of an effused fluid in some cavity of the body.

hydatoid (hī′dạ-toid), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑδατοειδής, like water, < ὑδωρ (ὑδατ-), water, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Watery; aqueous; resembling water in any way; specifically, in anat., pertaining to the aqueous humor of the eye.

II.† n. 1. The aqueous humor of the eye, as distinguished from the vitreous humor.—2. The investing membrane of the aqueous humor, as distinguished from the hyaloid investing the vitreous humor.

hyde[1]†, hyde[2]†, hyde[3]†. An obsolete spelling of hide[1], hide[2], hide[3].

hyder†, n. [< F. hydre, a water-adder: see hydra.] A water-snake. Cotgrave.

Hydnei (hid′nē-ī), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1825), < Hydnum + -ei.] A suborder of hymenomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Hydnum.

hydnoid (hid′noid), a. [< NL. Hydnum + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Resembling in form or structure the genus Hydnum.

Hydnum (hid′num), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδνον, an edible fungus, prob. the truffle.] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, of the family Hydnaceæ, characterized by having the hymenium inferior and spread over persistent spines or teeth which project from the pileus. The pileus is tough, or even coriaceous, in most of the species; but there are a few in which it is fleshy, and a small number, as H. repandum and H. coralloides, are described as edible. Two well-authenticated fossil species of Hydnum are known, from the Miocene deposits of Switzerland and Hesse.

hydra (hī′drạ), n.; pl. hydras, hydræ (-drạz, -drē). [= F. hydre, < L. hydra, < Gr. ὕδρα, Ionic ὕδρη, the Lernæan serpent, masc. ὕδρος, a water-snake, the ringed snake, Coluber natrix, also a smaller kind of water-animal (= Lith. udra, an otter, = OBulg. vydra = Pol. wydra = Russ. vuidra, an otter, = OHG. otter = AS. oter, E. otter), < ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water: see otter, hydro-, and water.] 1. In Gr. myth., a monstrous serpent or dragon of the lake or marsh of Lerna in Argolis, represented as having nine heads, each of which, being cut off, was immediately succeeded by two new ones unless the wound was cauterized. The destruction of this monster was one of the twelve labors of Hercules.

Gorgons, and hydras, and chimæras dire.
Milton, P. L., ii. 628.

Hence—2. Figuratively, multifarious evil; evil or misfortune arising from many sources and not easily to be surmounted.

And yet the hydra of my cares renews Still new-born sorrows of her fresh disdain.
Daniel, Sonnets to Delia, xv.

3. [cap.] An ancient southern constellation, representing a sea-serpent. It is of Babylonian origin, like most of the ancient constellations. It is bounded by the ancient constellations Canis Minor, Argo, Centaurus, Virgo, Corvus, Crater, Leo, and Cancer, and by the modern constellations Sextans and Monoceros (which separates it from Canis Major). It contains one star of the second magnitude, and about four hundred stars visible to the naked eye.

The Constellation Hydra.

4. In zoöl.: (a) A venomous sea-snake; any one of the Hydrophidæ of the Indian ocean. G. Cuvier. (b) In Hydrozoa: (1) [cap.] A genus of fresh-water polyps of very simple structure, typical of the family Hydridæ. Among the species are H. viridis, H. fusca, and H. vulgaris. The body has the form of a cylindrical tube, composed of two fundamental layers, the ectoderm and endoderm, the former containing in one variety green granules identical with the chlorophyl of plants. The base is disk-shaped, and by it the animal can attach itself to any body, being capable of shifting its position. The mouth is surrounded by a circle of extremely contractile tentacles, by which the animal obtains its food, and which are richly endowed with the urticating organs or thread-cells common in the order. The mouth opens immediately into the stomach, and there are no internal organs of any kind, and no anal orifice. Each part of a hydra divided into almost any number of fragments will develop into a fresh independent polypite. Reproduction is effected by gemmation as well as by means of ova and sperm-cells. The genus is said to have been first described by Trembley in 1774, but it is attributed by Agassiz to Linnæus (1756), and the animal was described by A. van Leeuwenhoek in 1703. See cut under Hydrozoa.

The wonderful power which Hydra possesses of reproducing lost parts was first discovered and made known by Trembley, of Geneva, in the first half of the eighteenth century. He determined that even a small piece of Hydra vulgaris possesses the power, under favorable conditions, of developing into a perfect animal.
Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 76.

(2) An individual or a species of the genus Hydra. (3) The sexual bud or medusa of any hydroid hydrozoan: so called from its resemblance to a species of the genus Hydra.—5. A form of self-registering thermometer having a compound head or bulb to contain the spirits, with the object of increasing the surface exposed to the air, and thus making the instrument work with great rapidity.—Cor Hydræ. See cor[1].—Hydra tuba (pl. hydræ tubæ), in Hydrozoa, a stage in the development of certain Discophora; as a classifying name, a larval form of such acalephs, which was supposed to be a distinct animal. See scyphistoma.

Hydrachna (hī-drak′nä), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀχνη, foam, froth, chaff, the least bit (mite).] 1. A genus of acarids founded by Müller in 1781, at present restricted to those fresh-water mites in which the third joint of the palpi is the longest, the beak is as long as the palpi, and the mandibles have sharp blades. These mites are parasitic only during the early stages upon aquatic insects, attaching themselves to species of Nepa, Ranatra, Dytiscus, etc. H. belostomæ is often found upon bugs of the family Belostomidæ, especially Perthostoma aurantiaca.

Hydrachna belostomæ.
a, adult (line shows natural size); b, mature larva, with pupa forming within (highly magnified).

2. A genus of water-beetles, family Dytiscidæ, containing such as the European H. tarda.

Hydrachnidæ (hī-drak′ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Hydrachna + -idæ.] A family of aquatic Acarida, typified by the genus Hydrachna; the water-mites. The skeleton is composed of sclerites embedded in soft skin, and the body is apparently unsegmented. Most of the Hydrachnidæ inhabit fresh water, and many are parasitic on mollusks, fishes, and aquatic insects. Other genera besides Hydrachna are Atax, Hydrochoreutes, Limnochares, Pontarachna, and Thalassarachna, the last two being marine. Also Hydrarachnidæ.

hydracid† (hī-dras′id), n. [⟨ hydr(ogen) + acid.] In chem., an acid formed by union of hydrogen with an electronegative element not containing oxygen.

hydracrylic (hī-dra-kril′ik), a. [⟨ hydr(ogen) + acrylic.] Differing from acrylic by the addition of the elements of water, H_2O.—Hydracrylic acid, $C_3H_6O_3$, an isomer of lactic acid, which when concentrated is a thick non-crystallizable acid syrup, and decomposes on heating into water and acrylic acid.

Hydractinia (hī-drak-tin′i-ä), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + Actinia.] The typical genus of Hydractiniidæ. H. echinata is an example. Colonies of these polyps may be found growing on shells, forming a delicate white moss-like structure.

Hydractiniidæ (hī-drak-ti-ni-nī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Hydractinia + -idæ.] A family of hydroid hydrozoans with free or rudimentary medusæ, of which the type is the genus Hydractinia. These hydroids form polyp colonies consisting of a dense mass of hydrorhizæ, whence simple or branched hydrocauli arise with three kinds of zoöids: ordinary nutritive zoöids with a verticil of filiform tentacles; reproductive zoöids of each sex; and a third kind, of slender form, without tentacles, but bearing cnidocells for the defense of the colony. The free medusæ have ocelli at the base of the tentacles, but no otoliths. The fertilized ova develop into planulas.

Hydradephaga (hī-dra-def′a-gä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of hydradephagus:* see hydradephagous.] The aquatic and adephagous beetles, comprising the two families Dytiscidæ and Gyrinidæ, in which the legs are fitted for swimming: distinguished from Geadephaga. Macleay, 1825. The group is also called Hydrocanthari.

hydradephagous (hī-dra-def′a-gus), a. [⟨ NL. hydradephagus*, ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀδηφάγος, gluttonous: see adephagous.] Aquatic and predatory, as certain beetles; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Hydradephaga.

hydraform (hī′dra-fôrm), a. Same as hydriform.

hydragogic (hī-dra-goj′ik), a. Having the character or effect of a hydragogue.

hydragogue (hī′dra-gog), n. [⟨ F. hydragogue, ⟨ LL. hydragogus, conducting water, a plant so called, ⟨ Gr. ὑδραγωγός, conducting water, a water-carrier, an aqueduct, ⟨ ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀγωγός, leading, ⟨ ἀγειν, lead, conduct: see agent.] In med.: (a) An active purgative, as jalap, which produces a great flux from the intestinal membrane, and consequently gives rise to very watery stools. (b) A remedy believed to be capable of drawing off serum effused into any part of the body, as a cathartic of the above class or a diuretic.

hydragogy†, n. [= Sp. hidrogogía, ⟨ Gr. ὑδραγωγία, a conducting of water, ⟨ ὑδραγωγός, conducting water: see hydragogue.] The art of constructing aqueducts, or of conducting water through channels.

Hydragogie demonstrateth the possible leading of water by nature's law, and by artificiall help, from any head (being a spring standing or running water) to any other place assigned. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

hydra-headed (hī′drä-hed″ed), a. Having numerous heads, like the Lernæan Hydra; hence, difficult of extirpation; self-renewing; springing up again after suppression, as abuses, vices, and the like.

Never Hydra-headed wilfulness
So soon did lose his seat, and all at once,
As in this king. Shak., Hen. V., i. 1.

Hydralgæ (hī-dral′jē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + L. alga, seaweed.] Same as Hydrophyta.

hydramnios (hī-dram′ni-os), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀμνίον, amnion.] In pathol., an excessive accumulation of liquor amnii. See liquor and amnion.

Hydrangea (hī-dran′jē-ä; properly hī-dran-jē′ä), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀγγειον, vessel: see angio-.] 1. A genus of shrubs or herbs, of the family Hydrangeaceæ, sometimes referred to the Saxifragaceæ, about 35 species, natives of Asia and America, characterized by having the ovary inferior, 4 or 5 valvate petals, 4 or 5 styles, free or connate at base, the fruit a capsule, and the leaves deciduous or persistent. The common hydrangea, H. opuloides, is a native of China. It was introduced into England by Sir J. Banks in 1790. It is a favorite for the beauty and size of its flowers, which form immense globular clusters, blue, pink, or white. H. arborescens, the wild American hydrangea, was introduced into European cultivation from Virginia in 1736; it is not much cultivated in the United States. H. quercifolia, the oak-leafed hydrangea, is wild from Georgia south, and is hardy at the north in cultivation. The genus is found in a fossil state, five extinct species having been described from the Miocene of Europe. Sometimes spelled Hydrangia.

Hydrangea arborescens. a, b, fertile and sterile flowers; c, fruit cut transversely; d, fruit entire.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Hydrangeaceæ (hī-dran-jē-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Hydrangea + -aceæ.] A family of plants related to the Saxifragaceæ. They are shrubs or trees with opposite exstipulate leaves, petals often valvate, stamens often epigynous, and the ovary in most of the genera 3- to 5-celled.

hydrangead (hī-dran′jē-ad), n. [⟨ Hydrangea + -ad[1].] A plant of the family Hydrangeaceæ, by some placed in the family Saxifragaceæ, tribe Hydrangeæ.

Street Fire-hydrants.

hydrant (hī′drant), n. [⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. -ant[1].] An apparatus for drawing water directly from a main (particularly from a main in a street), consisting of a hollow cylinder provided with one or more nozles to which hose may be attached, or with a spout, or the like, and usually with a valve and pipe for the escape of the excess of water, in order to guard against freezing. The common form of a fire-hydrant is that of an upright pipe standing about two feet above the ground, as on the edge of a sidewalk, with a nozle to which the filling-hose or suction-pipe of a fire-engine can be attached. The valve is below, next to the main, and is so arranged that the closing of it opens the waste-pipe and frees the hydrant from water. See cut in preceding column.

hydranth (hī′dranth), n. [⟨ Hydra, 4, + Gr. ἀνθος, flower.] A polypite; the fundamental structural element in Hydrozoa. It consists (with various modifications) of a sac having at one end an ingestive or oral aperture leading into a digestive cavity. The walls of the sac are formed of at least two cellular membranes, inner and outer, or endoderm and ectoderm, which have the morphological valence respectively of the epithelium and epidermis of the higher animals. Between these membranes a third layer, the mesoderm, may be developed. See also cuts under Campanularia and Diphyidæ.

A, hydranth of Athorybia rosacea, with a, one of the villi; B, a villus in extension, enlarged; C, a small retracted villus, still more magnified, with its vacuolar spaces (b) and cilia.

In an early stage of its existence every hydrozoon is represented by a single hydranth, but, in the majority of the Hydrozoa, new hydranths are developed from that first formed by a process of gemmation or fission. Huxley.

hydrapult (hī′dra-pult), n. See hydropult.

Hydrarchus (hī-drär′kus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀρχός, ruler, ⟨ ἀρχειν, rule.] A genus of fossil cetaceans: same as Basilosaurus. Also Hydrarchos. Koch.

hydrargillite (hī-drär′ji-līt), n. [⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀργιλλος, white clay: see argillaceous.] A crystalline variety of gibbsite, a hydrous oxid of aluminium.

hydrargire†, n. See hydrargyre.

hydrargochlorid, hydrargochloride (hī-drär-gō-klō′rid, -rid or -rīd), n. [⟨ hydrarg(yrum) + chlorid.] A double chlorid of mercury and some other base: as, hydrargochlorid of ammonium.

hydrargyral†, a. [⟨ hydrargyrum + -al.] Mercurial. Bailey.

hydrargyrate (hī-drär′ji-rāt), a. [⟨ hydrargyrum + -ate[1].] Of or pertaining to mercury.

hydrargyret†, n. [= Sp. hidrargirio = Pg. hydrargyro = It. idrargiro; ⟨ L. hydrargyrus, quicksilver: see hydrargyrum.] Quicksilver; mercury. Also spelled hydrargire.

hydrargyria (hī-drär-jir′i-ä), n. [NL., ⟨ hydrargyrum.] Same as hydrargyriasis.

hydrargyriasis (hī-drär-ji-rī′a-sis), n. [NL., ⟨ hydrargyrum + -iasis.] In pathol., mercurial poisoning; a morbid condition produced by the introduction of mercury into the animal system. Also called hydrargyrism, hydrargyrosis, hydrargyria, hydrargysm.

hydrargyric (hī-drär-jir′ik), a. [⟨ hydrargyrum + -ic.] Pertaining to hydrargyrum, or mercury; mercurial.

hydrargyrism (hī-drär′ji-rizm), n. [⟨ hydrargyrum + -ism.] Same as hydrargyriasis.

hydrargyrum (hī-drär′ji-rum), n. [NL., ⟨ L. hydrargyrus, ⟨ Gr. ὑδράργυρος, quicksilver (as artificially prepared from cinnabar ore; native quicksilver was called ἀργυρος χυτός, 'fused silver'), ⟨ ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀργυρος, silver: see argent.] Chemical symbol, Hg. Quicksilver; mercury. See mercury.

hydrargysm (hī-drär′jizm), n. Same as hydrargyriasis.

hydrarthrosis (hī-drär-thrō′sis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀρθρωσις, a jointing: see arthrosis.] In pathol., the accumulation of serous liquid in a joint-cavity.

hydrarthrus (hī-drär′thrus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀρθρον, joint.] Same as hydrarthrosis.

Hydraspidæ (hī-dras′pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Hydraspis + -idæ.] Same as Hydraspididæ.

Hydraspididæ (hī-dras-pid′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Hydraspis (-id-) + -idæ.] A family of tortoises, typified by the genus Hydraspis. The head is depressed and covered with small polygonal plates, and the flat skull has a distinct bony crown with a more or less elevated occipital arch. The species inhabit South America and Australia. In Cope's system of classification the family is limited to pleurodirous tortoises with three phalanges to most of the digits, and no zygomatic but a parietomastoid arch.

Hydraspis (hī-dras'pis), n. [NL. (Bell), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἀσπίς, a shield.] The typical genus of Hydraspididæ, containing such turtles as the Brazilian H. maximiliani.

hydrastine (hī-dras'tin), n. [< Hydrastis + *-ine*².] 1. An alkaloid found in the root of goldenseal, Hydrastis Canadensis. It is crystalline, odorless, and, on account of its insolubility, nearly tasteless. Also hydrastia.—2. A medicine used by eclectic physicians, which is a mixture of hydrastine, berberine, and resin. It is not to be confounded with the alkaloid hydrastine. U. S. Dispensatory.

Hydrastis (hī-dras'tis), n. [NL. (said to allude to the active properties of the juice), irreg. < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + δρᾶν, act: see drastic.] A genus of North American plants, of the family Ranunculaceæ. There are 2 species, one of which, H. Canadensis, is a small perennial herb, with a thick knotted rootstock, a single radical leaf, and a simple 2-leafed hairy stem which bears a solitary greenish-white flower. It is sometimes used in dyeing, and gives a beautiful yellow color; hence the common names yellowroot, orangeroot, goldenseal, and yellow puccoon.

hydratation (hī-drā-tā'shon), n. [< hydrate + -ation.] Same as hydration.

hydrate (hī'drāt), n. [= F. hydrate; as Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + *-ate*¹.] In chem., a compound of one or more molecules of water with a molecule of an element or compound: as, chlorin hydrate, $Cl_2.(H_2O)_{10}$; chloral hydrate, $C_2Cl_3HO.H_2O$. Improperly used as synonymous with hydroxid.—Croton-chloral hydrate. ★See croton.

hydrate (hī drāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. hydrated, ppr. hydrating. [= F. hydrater; as Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + *-ate*².] 1. To combine or impregnate with water.—2. To form into a hydrate.

To hydrate the milk and cane-sugar.
Hueppe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 96.

★Hydrated copper oxid. See copper.

hydration (hī-drā'shon), n. [< hydrate + -ion.] The process of combining or impregnating with water, or the resulting condition. Also hydratation.

The truths he [Prof. Graham] established respecting the hydration of compounds, the transpiration and the diffusion of liquids, . . . are all of them cardinal truths.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 226.

The solidity of the crust of the earth is limited by temperature and pressure under conditions of chemical constitution and hydration. Science, III. 511.

★hydraulic (hī-drâ'lik), a. [< F. hydraulique = Sp. hidráulico = Pg. hydraulico = It. idraulico (cf. D. G. hydraulisch = Dan. Sw. hydraulisk), < L. hydraulicus, < Gr. ὑδραυλικός, pertaining to the water-organ, < ὑδραυλις, also ὕδραυλος, a water-organ invented by an Egyptian named Ctesibius, lit. a water-pipe, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + αὐλός, a tube, pipe: see auletic.] Pertaining or relating to fluids in motion, or to hydraulics. See hydraulics.—Hydraulic balance, a regulator or governor for a water-wheel.—Hydraulic bear, a form of hydraulic press especially designed for punching rivet-holes or shearing iron.—Hydraulic belt, a water-lifting device consisting of an endless belt fitted with caps or buckets, like the lifter of a grain-elevator. The lower part works on a wheel submerged in the water, and the buckets discharge their loads as they turn over an upper wheel.—Hydraulic block, in a repairing-dock, a hydraulic lifting-press used as a substitute for a building block under the keel of a vessel. It is adjustable as to height, and is used in straightening hogged or sagged vessels.—Hydraulic blower, a form of bellows operated by a hydraulic motor.—Hydraulic brush, a brush at the end of a long handle, the handle serving as a pipe to convey water to the brush from a hose, or acting as an aquapult or syringe.—Hydraulic buffer, a device for checking the recoil of a cannon. A piston-rod working in a cylinder filled with liquid is fastened to the top carriage. The liquid escapes through holes in the piston-head, but so slowly that it hinders the motion of the piston, thus acting as a buffer.—Hydraulic cane, a rude form of pump, consisting of a tube having a valve opening inward at the lower end. By plunging the lower end in water and moving it rapidly up and down, the water can be made to rise in the tube.—Hydraulic cement. See cement.—Hydraulic compressor, in a gun-carriage, a device to prevent the recoil of the piece, by receiving the impact upon a piston which forces liquid through holes in a diaphragm contained in a chamber.—Hydraulic condenser, in gas-manuf., a chamber in which gas from the retorts is cooled.—Hydraulic crane, an apparatus for the raising or hoisting of loads on the principle of the hydraulic press.—Hydraulic dock, a floating dock. See cut under dock.—Hydraulic elevator. See elevator.—Hydraulic engine, a motor employing water under pressure as the source of power.—Hydraulic engineering, a special branch of civil engineering concerned with the construction of water-works and hydraulic machinery, and the improvement and control of streams, navigable waters, and canals.—Hydraulic gage a kind of manometer used to record the pressure in a hydraulic press, pump, or engine.—Hydraulic indicator, a gage to indicate the pressure of water.—Hydraulic jack, a jack or lifting-apparatus operated by means of some liquid, usually oil, acting against a piston or plunger, the pressure on the liquid being produced by a force-pump.—Hydraulic lime, a species of lime that hardens in water, or which can be used for making hydraulic cement.—Hydraulic main, in gas-works, a large iron pipe partly filled with water, into which all the pipes bringing the raw gas from the retorts enter, dipping below the water to form a seal. The main serves as the first purifier of the gas for use, and also to convey the crude gas to the condenser.—Hydraulic mill, a form of crushing-mill in which sugar-cane is steamed and pressed.—Hydraulic mining, a method of attacking the gravel or auriferous detritus and bringing it into the sluices, invented and until recently extensively employed in California. It has also been introduced into other gold regions, notably those of Australia. The essential feature of the method is that the gravel is broken up and washed down into the head of the sluice by one or more powerful jets of water, thrown upon the bank and used in such a way as to furnish a current of sufficient velocity to carry the debris down into the sluice. The volume of water used is often very large, and the delivery from the pipe takes place with great velocity, the water being under a heavy head. The diameter of the stream as it issues from the pipe is sometimes as much as 6 or 8 inches, and the head from 100 to 200 feet.—Hydraulic mortar. See mortar.—Hydraulic motor, a motor driven by water-power.—Hydraulic organ, an old form of organ in which water was used to regulate the pressure of the air. Also called hydraulicon.—Hydraulic pivot, in mach., a device by which a film of water is introduced below the end of a vertical axis to receive its weight, and relieve friction. Also called liquid bearing. E. H. Knight.—Hydraulic press, a press operated by the pressure of a liquid, under the action either of gravity or of some mechanical device, as a force-pump. It depends on the law of hydrostatics that any pressure upon a body of water is distributed equally in all directions throughout the whole mass, whatever its shape. In the more common forms the pressure of a piston upon a body of water in a cylinder of small area is distributed through pipes or openings to a piston of larger area, the statical force being thus multiplied in the direct ratio of the areas of the pistons. Thus, if the diameter of the small piston A is one inch and of the larger piston C in cylinder B is one foot, the area of C will be 144 times that of A; and if a load of one ton is applied to A, C will exert an upward statical force of 144 tons. The press properly so called is simply a frame placed over the large plunger so that its upward thrust can be exerted against any material held in the frame. Since the power of a hydraulic press can be exerted in any direction, it is used as the basis of a great number of machines, as the hydraulic block, crane, jack, dock, hoist, lift, punch, rail-bender, and shears, and for the pressing of paper and other materials. The pressure is applied to the water in the smaller cylinder by the simple weight of a column of water, as in the hydrostatic bellows, or by a weight placed on the piston by means of a lever or a screw, etc. Also called hydrostatic press and Bramah's press.—Hydraulic ram. (a) A self-contained and automatic pump operated partly by the pressure of a column of water in a pipe, and partly by the vis viva or living force acquired by intermittent motion of the column. The simplest form is shown in the figure. A is the supply-pipe; E, the source of supply; B, a hollow ball-valve seating upwards, of less diameter than the inside diameter of A, and having a specific gravity enough greater than that of the water to enable it to overcome the pressure of the water in A, and fall away from its seat when the water is at rest. D is an air-chamber connected at the bottom with A, and near the bottom with a much smaller discharge-pipe, F. C is a clack-valve. Water at first flows freely through A, by the ball-valve, and out at B. The column in A soon acquires velocity and consequent living force competent to lift the ball-valve to its seat, abruptly stopping the flow at B; but the living force of the column in A is now sufficient to overcome the back pressure upon, and lift, the valve C, and to force a part of the water from A into the chamber D. The discharge-pipe, F, being much smaller than A, the flow into D is temporarily much larger than the discharge from F. The confined air in D is therefore compressed. This pressure soon becomes sufficient to bring the liquid column in A to rest. The valve C then closes, but the pressure of the air in D still acts with diminishing force to expel water from D through F. The valve B now drops away from its seat, which again begins the series of operations, and so the action is indefinitely repeated. The water escaping from B is wasted. The machine can be used to raise water to a height many times greater than the available head. In another form this machine is adapted to draw water from a source independent of that which supplies the power for operating it. (b) The larger or lifting piston of a hydraulic press.—Hydraulic valve, an inverted cup which is lowered over the upturned open end of a pipe, the edge of the cup being submerged in water, forming a water-seal, and closing the pipe against the passage of air or gases. E. H. Knight.

hydraulical (hī-drâ'li-kal), a. [< hydraulic + -al.] Same as hydraulic. [Rare.]

I look not on a human body as on a watch or a handmill, . . . but as an hydraulical, or rather hydraulo-pneumatical engine, that consists not only of solid and stable parts, but of fluids, and those in organical motion.
Boyle, Works, p. 232.

hydraulically (hī-drâ'li-kal-i), adv. By hydraulic means; according to hydraulic principles.

hydraulician (hī-drâ-lish'an), n. [< hydraulic + -ian.] One who is skilled in hydraulics.

hydraulicity (hī-drâ-lis'i-ti), n. [< hydraulic + -ity.] The qualities necessary for making hydraulic cement, or that kind of mortar which will harden under water; the property of setting under water.

hydraulicking (hī-drâ'li-king), n. [< hydraulic(k) + *-ing*¹.] Hydraulic mining. See hydraulic.

hydraulicon (hī-drâ'li-kon), n. [< Gr. ὑδραύλικον (sc. ὄργανον), the hydraulic organ: see hydraulic.] Same as hydraulic organ (which see, under hydraulic).

hydraulics (hī-drâ'liks), n. [Pl. of hydraulic: see -ics.] That branch of engineering science which treats of the motion of liquids, the laws by which it is regulated, and the application of these principles to machinery, marine engineering, etc.

hydraulist (hī-drâ'list), n. [< hydraul(ic) + -ist.] One who is skilled in hydraulics.

Meton (the astronomer and hydraulist).
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 111.

hydrazine (hī'dra-zin), n. [< hydr(ogen) + az(ote) (?) + *-ine*².] 1. Diamide, H_4N_2, a colorless fuming liquid, soluble in water, having a peculiar odor and a strongly alkaline reaction.—2. The general name of a class of bodies derived from this body by replacing one or more of its hydrogen atoms by a compound radical: as, ethyl hydrazine, $C_2H_5N_2H_3$.

hydremia, hydræmia (hī-drē'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + αἷμα, blood.] A watery state of the blood; an excess of water in the blood.

hydremic, hydræmic (hī-drem'ik), a. [< hydremia, hydræmia, + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of hydremia; affected with hydremia: as, a hydremic state of the blood.

hydrencephal (hī-dren'se-fal), n. [< hydrencephalus.] Same as hydrencephalon.

hydrencephalocele (hī-dren-sef'a-lō-sēl), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἐγκέφαλος, brain, + κήλη, tumor.] 1. A cephalocele in which the sac contains serous liquid and brain-substance.—2. A monster having this deformity. Dunglison.

hydrencephaloid (hī-dren-sef'a-loid), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἐγκέφαλος, brain, + εἶδος, form.] Same as hydrocephaloid.

hydrencephalon (hī-dren-sef'a-lon), n. A hydrocephalous brain; a case of hydrocephalus. Also hydrencephal.

hydrencephalus (hī-dren-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἐγκέφαλος, brain: see encephalon.] Same as hydrocephalus, 1.

hydrenterocele (hī-dren'tėr-ō-sēl), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ἔντερον, intestine, + κήλη, tumor.] Intestinal hernia the sac of which incloses water.

hydria (hī'dri-ą), n.; pl. hydriæ (-ē). [L., < Gr. ὑδρία, a water-pot, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water: see hydro-.] In archæol., a large Greek vase, used especially for carrying water. It has a capacious body, with a narrow mouth and usually a broad rim, and three handles, one at the back extending above the rim, and a smaller one on each side.

Hydria, in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, Massachusetts.

hydriad (hī'dri-ad), n. [< Gr. ὑδριάς (ὑδριαδ-), of the water (ὑδριάδες νύμφαι, water-nymphs), < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water.] In myth., a water-nymph.

hydriæ (hī'dri-ē), n. pl. [L.] 1. Plural of hydria.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A group of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.

hydric (hī'drik), a. [< hydr(ogen) + -ic.] Pertaining to, combined with, or containing hydrogen.

hydrid[1], hydride (hī'drid, -drid or -drīd), n. [< hydr(ogen) + -id[1], -ide[1].] In chem., a substance consisting of hydrogen combined with an element, or with some compound radical which plays the part of an element: as, phosphorus hydrid; amyl hydrid.

hydrid[2] (hī'drid), n. A fresh-water polyp of the family Hydridæ; a hydra.

Hydridæ (hī'dri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydra + -idæ.] 1. A family of hydrozoans, typified by the fresh-water genus Hydra, alone representing in some systems the suborder Eleutheroblastea, of the order Hydroida. They are solitary polyps of simplest structure, maturing the sexual products in the gastral wall, and also propagating asexually by budding or fission. The process of budding is similar to that which takes place in colonial hydromedusans, only the buds become detached so that the polyp remains solitary; therefore Claus and others consider the Hydridæ simply as a family of Hydromedusæ. See cut under Hydrozoa.

2. In Gray's classification, a group of serpents, containing the venomous sea-serpents or Hydrophidæ, with many harmless snakes belonging properly to several different families.

hydride, n. See hydrid[1].

hydriform (hī'dri-fôrm), a. [< NL. hydriformis, < hydra, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] Relating to or resembling a hydra, or one of the Hydroida; hydroid. Also hydraform.

hydriodate (hī'dri-ō-dāt), n. [< hydriod(ic) + -ate[1].] A salt of hydriodic acid.

hydriodic (hī-dri-od'ik), a. [< hydr(ogen) + iod(ine) + -ic.] Produced by the combination of hydrogen and iodine.—Hydriodic acid, HI, a colorless gas formed by combining hydrogen and iodine, having a suffocating odor and fuming in the air. Its compounds with bases are called iodides.

hydro-. [< L. hydro- (> It. idro- = Sp. hidro- = Pg. F. hydro-), < Gr. ὑδρο-, before a vowel ὑδρ-, the usual combining form (ὑδατ- being the usual derivative form) of ὑδωρ (stem ὑδατ-), water: see water.] An element in many compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'water.' In chemical compounds other than hydrogen it usually represents hydrogen.

hydroa (hī-drō'ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ᾠόν = L. ovum, egg.] In pathol., a name of certain forms of vesicular or bulbous eruptions, usually regarded as forms of pemphigus, also of forms of herpes and herpes iris, and of sudamina.

hydroadenitis (hī-drō-ad-e-nī'tis), n. [NL. (prop. hydradenitis*), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. adenitis, q. v.] In pathol., inflammation of the sweat-glands.

hydroadipsia (hī″drō-a-dip'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. adipsia, q. v.] In pathol., a lack of thirst.

hydrobarometer (hī″drō-ba-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. barometer.] An instrument for determining the depth of the sea by the pressure of the superincumbent water.

Hydrobata (hī-drob'ą-tą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + βάτης, one that treads, < βαίνειν, go, walk.] A genus of birds, the dippers, giving name to the family Hydrobatidæ: a synonym of Cinclus. Vieillot, 1816.

Hydrobates (hī-drob'ą-tēz), n. [NL.: see Hydrobata.] 1. Same as Hydrobata. Boie, 1822. —2. The typical genus of water-bugs of the family Hydrobatidæ. Erichson, 1848.

Hydrobatidæ (hī-drō-bat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrobata + -idæ.] 1. A family of turdoid passerine birds, the dippers or water-ouzels, named from the genus Hydrobata: a synonym of Cinclidæ. See cuts under Cinclidæ and dipper.—2. A family of heteropterous insects, of elongate form, with the head sunken in the thorax up to the prominent rounded eyes, reflexed rostrum, 4-jointed antennæ, and inconspicuous ocelli if any. They live on the surface of the water, and are collectively called water-striders.

hydrobenzamide (hī-drō-ben'za-mid or -mīd), n. [< hydro(gen) + benzamide.] A compound ($C_{21}H_{18}N_2$) obtained by the action of aqueous ammonia on bitter-almond oil.

hydrobiosis (hī″drō-bī-ō'sis), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + βίος, life, + -osis.] The development of living organisms, as bacteria, in fluid media; the conditions of life of such organisms.

hydrobiotite (hī-drō-bī'ō-tīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + biotite.] A hydrated biotite, related to the vermiculites.

Hydrobius (hī-drō'bi-us), n. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + βίος, life.] A genus of water-beetles of the family Hydrophilidæ, having 9-jointed antennæ and slender palpi, with well-compressed and ciliated hind tarsi. It is a large and very wide-spread group, including 16 North American species.

hydroboracite (hī-drō-bō'rą-sīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + borax (-ac-) + -ite[2].] A mineral of white color, resembling fibrous and foliated gypsum. It is hydrated calcium and magnesium borate.

hydrobranch (hī'drō-brangk), n. One of the Hydrobranchiata.

Hydrobranchia (hī-drō-brang'ki-ą), n. pl. Same as Hydrobranchiata.

Hydrobranchiata (hī-drō-brang-ki-ā'tą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + βράγχια, gills, + -ata.] In Lamarck's latest classification, a division of gastropods, distinguished from Pneumobranchiata, and containing species which breathe water only. The section imperfectly corresponds to the nudibranchiates, inferobranchiates, and tectibranchiates of Cuvier.

hydrobranchiate (hī-drō-brang'ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hydrobranchiata.

hydrobromate (hī-drō-brō'māt), n. [< hydrobromic + -ate[1].] A salt of hydrobromic acid: same as bromide. Also called bromhydrate.

hydrobromic (hī-drō-brō'mik), a. [< hydro(gen) + brom(ine) + -ic.] Composed of hydrogen and bromine.—Hydrobromic acid, HB, an acid prepared by bringing phosphorus and bromine together with a little water. It is a colorless gas, having a strong suffocating odor, fuming in the air, and very soluble in water. Its salts are called bromides. The acid is somewhat used in medicine as a substitute for the bromides.

Hydrocampa (hī-drō-kam'pą), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1825), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κάμπη, caterpillar.] The typical genus of moths of the family Hydrocampidæ, having conspicuous maxillary palpi, distinct ocelli, and a short proboscis. The larvæ live hidden under floating leaves, and make for themselves cases of two oval bits of leaf. The genus is widely distributed in most parts of the world, though the species are few and none are North American. H. nymphæata and H. stagnata are two British species, known as china-marks. Also Hydrocampe.

Hydrocampa genuinalis. (About twice natural size.)

Hydrocampidæ (hī-drō-kam'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrocampa + -idæ.] A family of pyralid moths, typified by the genus Hydrocampa: so called from the aquatic habits of the larvæ.

Hydrocanthari (hī-drō-kan'thą-rī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κάνθαρος, a beetle.] In Latreille's system of entomological classification, the swimmers; the third tribe of pentamerous Coleoptera, including the aquatic carnivorous beetles, of the old genera Dytiscus and Gyrinus. It thus includes the modern families Dytiscidæ and Gyrinidæ, and is identical with the modern group Hydradephaga. Also Hydrocantharida, Hydrocantharidæ.

hydrocarbide (hī-drō-kär'bid or -bīd), n. Same as hydrocarbon.

hydrocarbon (hī-drō-kär'bon), n. [< hydro(gen) + carbon.] A compound of hydrogen and carbon. The hydrocarbons are a large and important group of compounds, and with their derivatives form the subject-matter of organic chemistry. In dietetics, the name includes fatty foods as distinguished from the carbohydrates, or sugars and starches.—Hydrocarbon black, burner, engine, furnace, etc. See the nouns.

hydrocarbonaceous (hī-drō-kär-bo-nā'shius), a. [< hydrocarbon + -aceous.] Consisting of or having the nature of hydrocarbon.

In order to obtain the highest illuminating power of a flame in which hydrocarbonaceous compounds are undergoing combustion, the regulation of the supply of air is essential. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 5.

hydrocarbonate† (hī-drō-kär'bo-nāt), n. [< hydrocarbon + -ate[1].] Carbureted hydrogen gas.

hydrocarbonic (hī″drō-kär-bon'ik), a. [< hydrocarbon + -ic.] Pertaining to or having the nature of hydrocarbon.

hydrocarbonous (hī-drō-kär'bo-nus), a. [< hydrocarbon + -ous.] Same as hydrocarbonic.

This hydrocarbonous pyrocone is closely surrounded or enveloped by gyrating, strongly-heated atmospheric air. W. A. Ross, Blowpipe, p. 71.

hydrocarburet† (hī-drō-kär'bū-ret), n. [< hydro(gen) + carburet, q. v.] Carbureted hydrogen gas.

hydrocardia (hī-drō-kär'di-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + καρδία = E. heart.] Same as hydropericardium.

hydrocastorite (hī-drō-kas'tọr-īt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + castorite: see castor[3].] A hydrated silicate of aluminium and calcium, derived from the alteration of petalite from Elba.

hydrocauli, n. Plural of hydrocaulus.

hydrocauline (hī-drō-kâ'lin), a. [< hydrocaulus + -ine[1].] Pertaining to or having the character of a hydrocaulus.

hydrocaulus (hī-drō-kâ'lus), n.; pl. hydrocauli (-lī). [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + καυλός, a stem.] In zoöl., the main stem of the cœnosarc of a hydrozoan.

hydrocele (hī'drō-sēl), n. [= F. hydrocèle, < L. hydrocele, < Gr. ὑδρωκήλη, hydrocele, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κήλη, tumor.] In pathol., a collection of serous fluid in the cavity of the tunica vaginalis of the testis. Dunglison.

hydro-cellulose (hī-drō-sel'ū-lōs), n. See the extract.

Cotton completely disorganised by acid, and obtained as a fine powder, seems to contain one molecule of water more than ordinary cellulose, and the substance thus produced has been termed hydro-cellulose. Hummel, Dyeing of Textile Fabrics (1886), p. 7.

hydrocephalic (hī″drō-sē-fal'ik or hī-drō-sef'ą-lik), a. [< hydrocephal-us + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hydrocephalus.

hydrocephaloid (hī-drō-sef'ą-loid), a. [< hydrocephalus + -oid.] Resembling hydrocephalus. Also hydrencephaloid.—Hydrocephaloid disease, a condition of somnolence or coma developed occasionally in children in conditions of exhaustion. It appears to depend on cerebral anemia hydrocephalous (hī-drō-sef'ą-lus), a. [< NL. hydrocephalus: see hydrocephalus.] Same as hydrocephaloid.

hydrocephalus (hī-drō-sef'ą-lus), n. [= F. hydrocéphale = Sp. hidrocéfalo = Pg. hydrocephalo, < NL. hydrocephalus, < Gr. ὑδροκέφαλον, water in the head, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. In pathol., an accumulation of serous fluid within the cranial cavity, either in the subdural space (external hydrocephalus) or in the ventricles (internal hydrocephalus). Acute hydrocephalus is usually, and apparently always, due to meningitis. (See meningitis.) Chronic hydrocephalus may be due to atrophy of the brain, to pressure on the veins of Galen by tumors or inflammatory products, or to other causes. Also hydrencephalus, hydrocranium.

2. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of trilobites. Barrande, 1846.

hydrocerusite (hī-drō-ser'ū-sīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + cerusite, q. v.] A basic lead carbonate occurring in thin hexagonal plates.

Hydrocharidaceæ (hī″drō-kar-i-dā'sē-ē), n. pl. [< Hydrocharis (-id-) + -aceæ.] The name given by Lindley in 1847 to a family of monocotyledonous aquatic herbs, which had been called Vallisneriaceæ by Dumortier in 1829. The name was subsequently corrected to Hydrocharitaceæ and has been used by many authors in both forms. Under these names it is called the frogbit family from the type genus Hydrocharis, the frogbit. Under the older name, which is to be preferred, it is called the tape-grass family from the type genus Vallisneria, the tape-grass. The other principal genera are Philiotria, Halophila, Hydrilla, Saivala, Thalassia, Stratiotes, and Ottelia, and upon these as types as many tribes are recognized by some authors. Some distinguish several subfamilies, and still others consider the somewhat heterogeneous group as constituting two or more families.

Hydrocharis (hī-drok'a-ris), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < Gr. ὑδροχαρής, delighting in water, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + χαίρειν, delight, rejoice.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the family Vallisneriaceæ, having floating stems, with floating tufts of radical leaves, peduncles, and submerged roots. The peduncles of the male plant are short, 2- or 3-flowered; the female spathe is sessile among the leaves; stamens 3 to 12; styles 6 with 2-cleft stigmas. H. Morsus-ranæ, the frogbit, one of the two species, is dispersed over Europe and northern and central Asia. The form appears to have been more abundant in Miocene times, four or five extinct species occurring in that formation in Europe.

Hydrochelidon (hī-drō-kel'i-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + χελιδών, a swallow.] A genus of Sterninæ, or terns, known as black terns or short-tailed sea-swallows. It contains several species of small size, with short and emarginate or moderately forked tail, very long and ample wings, and small feet with deeply emarginate webs. These birds undergo changes of plumage unusual in the group, the adults being chiefly black or blackish. There are several species, found in all parts of the world, such as the common black tern of Europe and America, H. lariformis, or fissipes, or nigra; the white-winged black tern, H. leucoptera; and the whiskered black tern, H. hybrida. Boie, 1822.

hydrochinon (hī-drō-kī'non), n. Same as hydroquinone.

hydrochlorate (hī-drō-klō'rāt), n. [< hydrochloric + -ate[1].] A salt of hydrochloric acid.

hydrochloric (hī-drō-klō'rik), a. [< hydro(gen) + chlor(in) + -ic.] Pertaining to or compounded of chlorin and hydrogen gas. Also chlorhydric, chlorohydric, chlorydric.—Hydrochloric acid, HCl, a colorless gas having a suffocating odor and an acid taste. It is irrespirable, and not a supporter of combustion. It is extremely soluble in water, and its solution forms the hydrochloric acid or muriatic acid of commerce. It is one of the most important acids commercially, and is made as a by-product of the soda-ash manufacture. Its salts, the chlorids, are quite widely distributed in nature and extensively used in the arts. Also called hydrogen chlorid.—Hydrochloric ether. Same as chloric ether (which see, under chloric).

Hydrochœridæ (hī-drō-ker'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrochœrus + -idæ.] A family of hystricomorphic rodents, represented by the genus Hydrochœrus, related to the Caviidæ, but distinguished by certain cranial and dental characters; the capibaras or water-cavies.

Hydrochœrus (hī-drō-kē'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + χοῖρος, a pig.] The typical and only genus of Hydrochœridæ, commonly referred to the Caviidæ. There is but one species, H. capibara. See cut under capibara.

Hydrochoreutes (hī″drō-kō-rō'tēz), n. [NL. (Koch, 1837), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + χορευτής, a dancer, < χορεύειν, dance, < χορός, a dance: see chorus.] A notable genus of water-mites, of the family Hydrachnidæ. They are parasitic upon water-bugs, as H. globulus upon Nepa cinerea, and their larvæ have been found adhering to the eyes of the larvæ of Libellulidæ.

hydrocinchonine (hī-drō-sing'kō-nin), n. [< hydro(gen) + cinchonine, q. v.] An alkaloid ($C_{19}H_{24}N_2O$) which was erroneously thought to have been formed by the reduction of cinchonine.

hydrocœlia (hī-drō-sē'li-ạ), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κοιλία, a hollow, the belly.] In pathol., same as ascites. Thomas, Med. Dict.

Hydrocorallinæ (hī-drō-kor-a-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydra (q. v.) + LL. corallinus, coralline.] An order or suborder of Hydroidea, class Hydrozoa, resembling true corals, or coralligenous Actinozoa, but belonging to a different class; the coral-making hydroid hydrozoans, as millepores or milleporic corals. They have a hard coral-like polypary and two kinds of zoöids, the ordinary nutritive gastrozoöids and the mouthless tentacular forms known as dactylozoöids; the cœnosarc consists of a network of anastomosing cells; reproduction is by means of gonophores. The Hydrocorallinæ include two families, Milleporidæ and Stylasteridæ.

hydrocoralline (hī-drō-kor'a-lin), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Hydrocorallinæ, or having their characters; milleporic.

II. n. One of the Hydrocorallinæ; a millepore or some similar coral.

Hydrocorax (hī-drok'ō-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κόραξ, a raven, crow.] 1. A genus of hornbills, of the family Bucerotidæ, in which Brisson (1760) placed all the species of hornbills known to him: restricted by late writers to the group of hornbills of the Philippines of which Buceros hydrocorax of Linnæus is the type, characterized by a flattened casque, chestnut-red and black plumage, and white tail.—2. A genus of cormorants, of the family Phalacrocoracidæ: a synonym of Phalacrocorax or Graculus. Vieillot, 1816. See cut under cormorant.

Hydrocores (hī-drok'ō-rēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κόρις, a bug.] Same as Hydrocorisæ.

Hydrocorisæ (hī-drō-kor'i-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), irreg. < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κόρις, a bug.] A division of heteropterous Hemiptera, embracing the aquatic species. They are characterized by having short antennæ concealed in cavities beneath the eyes, and natatorial legs. Called Cryptocerata by Douglass and Scott, and by Fallen distributed into two divisions. Also Hydrocores, Hydrocorisa.

hydrocotarnia (hī″drō-kō-tär'ni-ạ), n. Same as hydrocotarnine.

hydrocotarnine (hī″drō-kō-tär'nin), n. [< hydro(gen) + cotarnine, q. v.] A crystalline alkaloid ($C_{12}H_{15}NO_3$) occurring in small amount in opium.

Hydrocotyle (hī-drō-kot'i-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κοτύλη, a cavity, a cup. The plants grow in moist situations and the leaves are hollowed like cups.] A genus of plants of the family Apiaceæ, type of the tribe Hydrocotyleæ, having the fruit much compressed, the calyx-teeth minute or obsolete, the petals concave, valvate, or imbricate, and the umbels simple. About 70 species are known, very widely distributed over the warm and temperate parts of the world. They are usually small herbs, creeping and rooting at the nodes; a few are erect. H. vulgaris (common pennywort, pennyrot, or flukewort) is a common European plant, growing in boggy places and on the edges of lakes and rivulets. It has round peltate leaves, and small simple umbels of pale-pink flowers. There are a, flower; b, fruit; c, same cut transversely; d, tuber.

several American species, of which H. Americana and H. umbellata are the most abundant, the former being common in the Northern States, and the latter from Massachusetts south. H. Americana has recently been observed to produce tubers. (See cut.) H. umbellata has sometimes been called sheep's-bane, from its being supposed to cause foot-rot. Centella Asiatica, employed in India as an alterative tonic, and the South African Centella glabrata, have been referred to the genus.

Hydrocotyleæ (hī″drō-kō-til'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Hydrocotyle + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Apiaceæ, in which the fruit is laterally much compressed or with the commissures often narrowly constricted, the carpels acute or obtuse on the back. Also written Hydrocotylidæ (Lindley), Hydrocotylineæ (Sprengel), and Hydrocotyleneæ (Koch).

hydrocranium (hī-drō-krā'ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κρανίον, the skull, head.] Same as hydrocephalus, 1. Dunglison.

hydrocuprite (hī-drō-kū'prīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + cuprite, q. v.] A supposed hydrated oxid of copper.

hydrocyanic (hī″drō-sī-an'ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + cyan(ogen) + -ic.] In chem., pertaining to or derived from the combination of hydrogen and cyanogen.—Hydrocyanic acid, HCN, a colorless liquid which solidifies at 5° F. to feathery crystals, and boils at 80°. Its specific gravity is about 0.7. It dissolves freely in water, forming a liquid which reddens litmus-paper but slightly. Laurel-leaves, bitter almonds, and many stone-fruits contain amygdalin, which under the action of a ferment breaks up into grape-sugar, oil of bitter almonds, and hydrocyanic acid. It is generally prepared by the action of sulphuric acid on potassium ferrocyanide. It is one of the most prompt and virulent poisons known. Very dilute hydrocyanic acid is frequently used medicinally as a powerful sedative and anti-irritant, especially to allay cough. Its salts are called cyanides, and some of them are of great commercial importance, particularly potassium cyanide and the complex cyanides, potassium ferrocyanide and ferricyanide. Also prussic acid.

hydrocyanide (hī-drō-sī'a-nid or -nīd), n. [< hydrocyanic + -ide[1].] A salt of hydrocyanic acid: same as cyanide.

hydrocyanite (hī-drō-sī'a-nīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κυανός, blue, + -ite[2]: see cyanite.] Anhydrous sulphate of copper in pale-green crystals, found at Vesuvius as a sublimation product of the eruption of October, 1868. When exposed to the air the crystals absorb water and become bright-blue.

Hydrocyon (hī-dros'i-on), n. [NL. (orig. Hydrocynus, Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κύων, dog.] The typical genus of Hydrocyoninæ. It includes African fresh-water fishes with elongated canine teeth, whence the name.

Hydrocyoninæ (hī-drō-sī-ō-ni'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrocyon + -inæ.] A subfamily of fishes of the family Characinidæ, typified by the genus Hydrocyon. They have large conical teeth in both jaws; an adipose fin; a short dorsal fin; rather narrow gill-openings, the gill-membranes being grown to the isthmus; and the nasal openings close together. Species occur in the fresh waters of both Africa and South America.

hydrocyst (hī'drō-sist), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κύστις, a bladder (cyst).] One of the processes or tentacles attached to the cœnosarc of the physophorous oceanic hydrozoans, borne with groups of gonophores upon a common stem, constituting a gonoblastidium or blastostyle. See cut under gonoblastidium.

hydrocystic (hī-drō-sis'tik), a. [< hydrocyst + -ic.] Having the character of a hydrocyst.

Hydrodictyeæ (hī″drō-dik-tī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kuetzing, 1843), < Hydrodictyon + -eæ.] A subfamily of green-spored algæ, typified by the genus Hydrodictyon. Also written Hydrodictyoneæ (Hassall), Hydrodictyonideæ (Gray), and Hydrodictieæ (Mathew).

Hydrodictyon (hī-drō-dik'ti-on), n. [NL. (A. W. Roth, 1800), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + δίκτυον, a net.] A genus of curious fresh-water green algæ, the type of the family Hydrodictyaceæ, order Protococcales. The cells are oblong-cylindrical, united into a reticulated saccate cœnobium; all are fertile; some produce macrogonidia, which join themselves into a cœnobium within the mother-cell; others produce microgonidia, which are furnished with vibratile cilia and a lateral red spot; these after a brief motile period subside into protococcoid, thick-walled spores. (Cooke.) The plant when full-grown resembles a long purse, whence the name water-net, and consists of a beautifully regular network of threads. The single known species, H. utriculatum, is common to North America and Europe.

The Hydrodictyon may be looked upon as an elaborate type of a cell-family, one in which cells are conjoined in accordance with a definite plan, so as to make a body of definite shape and size, yet in which each cell is an independent being, drawing nothing from its neighbors.
H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Algæ, p. 93.

hydrodynamic (hī″drō-dī-nam'ik), a. [= F. hydrodynamique, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] Pertaining to or derived from the force or motion of a fluid; relating to hydrodynamics.

An important property of the harmonic nodal line, indicated by an interesting hydrodynamic theorem due to Rankine, is that, when self-cutting at any point or points, the different branches make equal angles with one another round each point of section.
Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., I. ii. ¶ 780.

hydrodynamical (hī″drō-dī-nam'i-kạl), a. [< hydrodynamic + -al.] Same as hydrodynamic.

hydrodynamics (hī″drō-dī-nam'iks), n. [Pl. of hydrodynamic: see -ics.] The mathematical theory of the application of the principles of dynamics to fluids. As dynamics is used in two senses, the wider to include the theories both of rest and of motion, the narrower to include only the theory of motion, there are two corresponding senses of the word hydrodynamics. See dynamics. Also called hydrokinetics.—Equation of hydrodynamics. See equation.

hydrodynamometer (hī-drō-dī-na-mom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. dynamometer.]

An instrument for measuring the pressure exerted by a flowing liquid, and hence for determining its velocity.

Hydrœcia[1] (hī-drē′si-ạ), n. [NL. (Guenée, 1841), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + οἶκος, a house.] A genus of noctuid moths, of the family Apamidæ, having the male antennæ not pectinate, the proboscis moderately long, and the legs stout. There are many species, confined to Europe and North America. H. immanis is a hop-pest in the United States. Synonymous in part with Gortyna.

hydrœcia[2], n. Plural of hydrœcium.

hydrœcial (hī-drē′si-ạl), a. [< hydrœcium + -al.] Having the character of a hydrœcium.

hydrœcium (hī-drē′si-um), n.; pl. hydrœcia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + οἶκος, a house.] A sac attached to the swimming-bell or nectocalyx of certain oceanic hydrozoans, as calycophorans, into which the cœnosarc may be retracted. See cut under Diphyidæ.

hydro-electric (hī″drō-ē-lek′trik), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. electric.] Effecting the development or transmission of electricity by means of steam or water.—Hydro-electric machine, a machine for generating electricity by the escape of steam under high pressure from a series of jets connected with a strong boiler, in which the steam is produced. The jets of steam (which have to pass through a cooling-box) are electrified by friction. Positive electricity is collected by directing the steam upon a metal comb communicating with an insulated conductor.

Armstrong's Hydro-electric Machine.

hydroferricyanic (hī″drō-fer″i-sī-an′ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + ferricyanic.] Compounded of hydrogen and ferricyanogen.—Hydroferricyanic acid, $H_3Fe(CN)_6$, a strong hexavalent acid produced by the action of sulphuric acid and potassium ferricyanide. It forms brown deliquescent crystals.

hydroferrocyanic (hī″drō-fer″ō-sī-an′ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + ferrocyanic, q. v.] Compounded of hydrogen and ferrocyanogen.—Hydroferrocyanic acid, $H_4Fe(CN)_6$, a strong tetrabasic acid formed by the action of dilute acid on potassium ferrocyanide.

hydrofluoboric (hī-drō-flō-ō-bō′rik), a. [< hydro(gen) + fluoboric.] Same as fluoboric.

hydrofluoric (hī″drō-flō-or′ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + fluor(in) + -ic.] Consisting of fluorin and hydrogen. Also fluohydric, fluorhydric.—Hydrofluoric acid, HF, an acid obtained by distilling a mixture of fluor-spar with sulphuric acid. It has an intensely irritating, suffocating odor, and a very strong affinity for water, acts energetically on glass, and is most destructive to animal matter. Also called fluoric acid.

hydrofluosilicate (hī-drō-flō-ō-sil′i-kāt), n. [< hydrofluosilic(ic) + -ate.] A salt formed by the union of hydrofluosilicic acid with a base.

hydrofluosilicic (hī″drō-flō″ō-si-lis′ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + fluosilicic.] Consisting of hydrofluoric and fluosilicic acid.—Hydrofluosilicic acid, a compound acid (H_2SiF_6) which is formed when silicon tetrafluoride is led into water. The saturated solution is a very acid, fuming, colorless liquid.

hydrofuge (hī′drō-fūj), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + L. fugare, put to flight, < fugere, flee: see fugitive.] In zoöl., shedding water; impervious to water, as the plumage of ducks, the pubescence of many insects, etc.

hydrogalvanic (hī″drō-gal-van′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. galvanic.] Pertaining to, consisting of, or produced by electricity evolved by the action or use of fluids: as, a hydrogalvanic current.

Hydrogastreæ (hī-drō-gas′trē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher and Unger, 1843), < Hydrogastrum + -eæ.] A former family of fresh-water algæ, allied closely to the Vaucheriaceæ. The plants are small, terrestrial, and unicellular, in the form of an expanded sack or bag at the top, with the lower portion excessively and finely branched, but with the cavity continuous. It contained the single genus Botrydium (Hydrogastrum). Also written Hydrogastrideæ (Lindley).

Hydrogastrum (hī-drō-gas′trum), n. [NL. (Desvaux, 1810) (so called in allusion to the sack-like shape of the plants), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + γαστήρ, stomach.] A former genus of fresh-water algæ, now Botrydium.

hydrogen (hī′drō-jen), n. [= F. hydrogène = Sp. hidrógeno = Pg. hydrogeneo, hydrogenio = It. idrogeno, < NL. hydrogenium, hydrogen (so called because it is one of the elements of water, H_2O), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -γενής, producing: see -gen.] Chemical symbol, H. One of the elementary substances, existing as a colorless, tasteless, and inodorous gas. It is the lightest substance known, and for that reason its specific gravity has been taken as the unit for comparing the specific gravity of gases, though air is also a commonly accepted standard. Under like conditions of temperature and pressure, hydrogen is approximately 14.4 times as light as an equal volume of air. Its combining weight is also less than that of any other element, and is therefore called unity, all the other atomic weights being expressed as multiples of it. It is but slightly soluble in water or any other liquid. Hydrogen refracts light slightly, is extremely diffusible, and is absorbed or occluded in a remarkable manner by certain metals when they are heated, as though it formed a kind of alloy with them. Hydrogen burns in air with a very pale blue flame and intense heat, the sole product of combustion being water, H_2O, which is the protoxid of hydrogen. A mixture of two volumes of hydrogen and six of air or one of oxygen explodes violently when brought in contact with a flame or the electric spark. Hydrogen is not specifically poisonous when inhaled, but is fatal to life by preventing or hindering access of oxygen to the blood. It is prepared by the action of dilute sulphuric acid on zinc or iron, by passing steam through a red-hot tube filled with iron turnings, by the electrolysis of water, and in a variety of other ways. Hydrogen occurs free in nature in small quantity in the emanations of volcanoes and of some oil-wells, but generally it is found only in its combinations, which are universally distributed. One ninth of the weight of water consists of hydrogen, and it is an indispensable element of every animal or vegetable structure. It is a component of all acids, and its replacement in them by bases produces salts. For a long time uncondensed, it was at last liquefied and solidified by Olszewski and Dewar. The boiling-point is −252.5° C.; the melting-point is about −256.3° C.; the density as liquid is .07 (water = 1).—Arseniureted hydrogen. See arseniureted.—Bicarbureted or heavy carbureted hydrogen. Same as ethylene.—Hydrogen chlorid, iodide, bromide, etc. Same as hydrochloric acid, hydriodic acid, etc.—Hydrogen sulphid, or sulphureted hydrogen, H_2S, a colorless inflammable gas having a sweetish taste and an exceedingly fetid smell resembling rotten eggs. It is extremely poisonous when inhaled. It has feeble acid properties, and its compounds with bases are called sulphids. It occurs in the emanations of volcanoes, and is evolved when animal or vegetable tissue containing sulphur decays. It also occurs in mineral springs, being liberated by the reduction of gypsum or other sulphates through the action of a microbe.—Light carbureted hydrogen. See carbureted.—Seleniureted hydrogen. Same as hydroselenic acid (which see, under hydroselenic).

hydrogenate (hī′drō-jen-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. hydrogenated, ppr. hydrogenating. [< hydrogen + -ate[2].] To cause to combine with hydrogen; hydrogenize.

hydrogenation (hī″drō-je-nā′shọn), n. [< hydrogenate + -ion.] The act of hydrogenating, or the state of being hydrogenated.

> This hydrogenation is easily effected by treating cuprous acetylene with hydrogen.
> W. R. Bowditch, Coal Gas, p. 284.

hydrogeniferous (hī″drō-je-nif′e-rus), a. [< hydrogen + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] Containing hydrogen.

hydrogenise, v. t. See hydrogenize.

hydrogenium (hī-drō-jē′ni-um), n. [NL.: see hydrogen.] 1. Hydrogen regarded as a metal; solidified hydrogen.

> Water is the rust of hydrogenium, a true metal.
> J. R. Nichols, Fireside Science, p. 182.

2. Hydrogen occluded by palladium. See occlusion. Graham.

hydrogenize (hī′drō-jen-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hydrogenized, ppr. hydrogenizing. [< hydrogen + -ize.] To combine with hydrogen; form a hydrogenous compound of. Also spelled hydrogenise.

> Chlorine readily enters into reaction with a large number of hydrogenized carbon compounds, and displaces the hydrogen more or less completely. Encyc. Brit., V. 493.

hydrogenous (hī-droj′e-nus), a. [< hydrogen + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to or containing hydrogen.—2. Formed or produced by water: applied to rocks formed by the action of water, in contradistinction to pyrogenous rocks, or those formed by the action of heat.

hydrogeology (hī″drō-jē-ol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. geology.] The geology of water; that part of geological science which has to do with the relations of water standing or flowing beneath the surface of the earth. The term is but little used, and rarely, if ever, with reference to chemical changes brought about at depth by the agency of water, or in which water plays a part.

hydrogiobertite (hī″drō-jō-bèrt′it), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + giobertite, q. v.] A hydrous carbonate of magnesium occurring in small spherical forms of a light-gray color at Vesuvius.

hydrognosy (hī-drog′nō-si), n. [= Sp. hidrognosía, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + γνῶσις, knowledge.] A treatise on, or a history and description of, the waters of the earth.

hydrographer (hī-drog′ra-fėr), n. [As hydrograph-y + -er[1].] One who is versed in the science or engaged in the practice of hydrography; specifically, one who has charge of hydrographic surveys and of other operations belonging to hydrography.

> In all coasts, what moon maketh full sea, and what way the tides and ebbes come and go, the hydrographer ought to record. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).
> He [Dr. Halley] likewise corrected the position of the coast of Brazil, which had been very erroneously laid down by all former hydrographers. Anson, Voyage, i. 8.

hydrographic (hī-drō-graf′ik), a. [As hydrograph-y + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or treating of hydrography: as, a hydrographic survey or treatise.—Hydrographic Office, an office of the Navy Department of the United States, controlled by the Bureau of Equipment. Its duties are to provide nautical charts, sailing directions, etc., for United States vessels and others. Its head is called the hydrographer. Other governments have similar bureaus.

hydrographical (hī-drō-graf′i-kạl), a. [< hydrographic + -al.] Same as hydrographic.

> The artificer must in the framing of his little engine have had due regard to all these, and consequently have had a comprehension of divers celestial and hydrographical truths. Boyle, Works, VI. 724.

hydrography (hī-drog′ra-fi), n. [= F. hydrographie = Sp. hidrografía = Pg. hydrographia = It. idrografia, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. The science of the measurement and description of the sea, lakes, rivers, and other waters, with especial reference to their use for the purposes of navigation and commerce. It embraces pilotage and marine surveying, the determination of winds, currents, etc., as well as the art of forming charts exhibiting not only the seacoast, gulfs, bays, islands, promontories, channels, and their configuration and geographical position, but also the contour of the bottom of the sea and of harbors. It also embraces the study of the relation of changes in depth to their causes.

> Hydrographie requireth a perticular register of certain landmarks (where marks may be had) from the sea well able to be skried, in what points of the sea-compasse they appear, and what apparent form, situation, or bigness they have in respect of any dangerous place in the sea or neer unto it assigned. Dee, Prᵉf. to Euclid (1570).
> Setting downe alwayes with great care and diligence true obseruations & notes of al those countreys, islands, coasts of the sea, and other things requisite to the artes of nauigation and hydrographie.
> Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 417.

2. The distribution, character, and relations of bodies of water; the condition of the earth or any part of it with respect to its seas, rivers, etc.: as, the hydrography of North America.

hydroguret (hī-drog′ū-ret), n. [< hydrog(en) + -uret.] A compound of hydrogen with a base.

hydrogureted, hydroguretted (hī-drog′ū-ret-ed), a. [< hydroguret + -ed[2].] Combined with hydrogen, as a metal or other base.

hydrohematite, hydrohæmatite (hī-drō-hem′a-tīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. hematite.] A hydrated iron sesquioxid, resembling the anhydrous iron sesquioxid hematite, particularly in its red streak. See turgite.

hydrohemostat, hydrohæmostat (hī-drō-hem′ō-stat), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + αἷμα, blood, + στατός, verbal adj. of ἱστάναι, cause to stand: see static. Cf. hemostatic.] A device to arrest a hemorrhage, consisting of a bag through which cold water is passed, while it is pressed against the surface.

hydroid (hī′droid), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑδροειδής, like water, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + εἶδος, form. In defs. 2 and 3, as Hydra + -oid.] I. a. 1. Like water; living in the water.—2. Resembling the hydra, or an animal of the genus Hydra.—3. Pertaining to the Hydroida or Hydroidea, or having their characters: as, a hydroid hydrozoan.—Hydroid stock, a stolon; a hydrorhiza.

II. n. One of the Hydroidea.

> In the Gulf of Mexico are communities of hydroids so organized that they seem to constitute but one animal.
> Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 318.

Calyptoblastic hydroids. See calyptoblastic.—Tubularian hydroids. See Gymnoblastea.

Hydroidea (hī-droi′dē-ạ), n. pl. [NL.: see hydroid.] An order or subclass of the class Hydrozoa, approximately equivalent to Hydrophora, and consisting of the eleutheroblastic, gymnoblastic, and calyptoblastic hydrozoans.

In some systems of classification it also includes the Trachymedusæ and Hydrocorallinæ. The group Hydromedusæ of some authors is equivalent to Hydroidea. Also Hydroida.

hydrokinetic (hī″drō-ki-net′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + κινητικός, of moving, < κινεῖν, move.] Pertaining to the motion of fluids.

Hydrokinetic permeability—a name for the specific quality of a porous solid according to which, when placed in a moving frictionless liquid, it modifies the flow.
Sir C. W. Thomson, Reprint of Papers, § 628.

hydrokinetical (hī″drō-ki-net′i-kal), a. [< hydrokinetic + -al.] Same as hydrokinetic.

hydrokinetics (hī″drō-ki-net′iks), n. [Pl. of hydrokinetic: see -ics.] The mathematical theory of the motion of fluids; the kinetics of fluids, in either of the meanings of kinetics.

Hydrolea (hī-drō′lē-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus) (so called because growing in wet places), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + L. oleum, oil (or Gr. ἔλαιον, olive-oil, oil).] A name given by Linnæus in 1762 to Nama, a genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the family Hydrophyllaceæ. They have a subrotate 5-cleft corolla, sepals distinct in the bud, stamens about the length of the corolla, filaments dilated at the insertion, ovary 2- or 3-celled, and styles 2 or 3. They are herbs or rarely suffruticose plants with ovate or lanceolate entire leaves, which are numerous on the stem and often with a spine in the axils, and clustered blue or white flowers. About 15 species are known, widely distributed in warm countries. Four species are found in the southern United States. Nama Zeylanica of India has bitter leaves, which are beaten into pulp and applied as a poultice to sores, with good effect.

Hydroleaceæ (hī-drō-lē-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (R. Brown), < Hydrolea + -aceæ.] Same as Hydrophyllaceæ.

Hydroleeæ (hī-drō-lē′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (R. Brown, 1816), < Hydrolea + -eæ.] An old tribe of plants of the family Hydrophyllaceæ, based on Hydrolea (Nama).

hydrolite (hī′drō-līt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + λίθος, stone: see -lite.] The zeolitic mineral gmelinite.

hydrologic (hī-drō-loj′ik), a. [< hydrolog-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hydrology.

We . . . consider the forests . . . as regulators of hydrologic conditions, influencing the waterflow in springs, brooks, and rivers. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 226.

hydrological (hī-drō-loj′i-kal), a. [< hydrologic + -al.] Same as hydrologic.

hydrologist (hī-drol′ō-jist), n. [< hydrolog-y + -ist.] One skilled in hydrology.

hydrology (hī-drol′ō-ji), n. [= F. hydrologie = Sp. hidrología = Pg. hydrologia = It. idrologia, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of water, its properties, phenomena, and laws, its distribution over the earth's surface, etc.

hydrolysis (hī-drol′i-sis), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + λύσις, a dissolving, < λύειν, loose, dissolve.] A kind of chemical decomposition by which a compound is broken up and resolved into other compounds by taking up the elements of water. Thus, by hydrolysis cane-sugar takes up a molecule of water and is resolved into one molecule of dextrose and one of levulose.

hydrolytic (hī-drō-lit′ik), a. [< hydrolysis (-lyt-) + -ic.] Producing hydrolysis, or related to the process or results of hydrolysis.

Hydrolytic decompositions, that is to say, such as are connected with the union of the elements of water with the decomposing body. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 671.

hydromagnesite (hī-drō-mag′ne-sīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. magnesia + *-ite*2.] A white native hydrous carbonate of magnesium, sometimes occurring in crystals, but more frequently amorphous, earthy, and chalk-like.

hydromancy (hī′drō-man-si), n. [= Sp. hidromancia = It. idromanzia, < L. hydromantia, < Gr. as if ὑδρομαντεία* (cf. ὑδρόμαντις, one who divines from water), < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by some use or from some ★phenomenon of water.

hydromania (hī-drō-mā′ni-ä), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μανία, madness.] In pathol., a species of melancholia under the influence of which the sufferer is led to commit suicide by drowning. It sometimes appears in pellagra.

hydromantic (hī-drō-man′tik), a. and n. [As hydromancy (-mant-) + -ic.] I. a. Pertaining to hydromancy.

II. n. The art of producing surprising effects dependent on the principles of hydrostatics and hydrodynamics.

hydromechanics (hī″drō-mē-kan′iks), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. mechanics, q. v.] The science of the mechanics of fluids, or of their laws of equilibrium and motion, including the divisions of hydrostatics and hydrodynamics, and also hydraulics.

It is perhaps superfluous to speak of the important place which the subject of hydromechanics has occupied in modern mathematical physics since the labors of Helmholtz, Maxwell, and Thomson in reducing the mathematical treatment of electricity and magnetism to that of the motion of incompressible fluids. Science, III. 78.

hydromedusa (hī″drō-mē-dū′sä), n.; pl. hydromedusæ (-sē). [NL. (cf. Gr. Ὑδρομέδουσα, the name of a frog in the poem "Batrachomyomachia"), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + Μέδουσα, Medusa: see Medusa, medusa.] 1. Same as hydromedusan.

One hydromedusa lays its eggs early in the morning. Science, IV. 429.

2. [cap.] A genus of reptiles. Wagler.

Hydromedusæ (hī″drō-mē-dū′sē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Hydromedusa, q. v.] A zoölogical group, variously limited. (a) A class of cœlenterates corresponding to the class Hydrozoa. C. Vogt, 1851. (b) A subclass of Hydrozoa, contrasted with Scyphomedusæ, containing all those hydrozoans which are related to Hydra through the fact of reproducing by means of lateral gemmation, not by strobilation or scyphistoma. This subclass is composed of the gymnoblastic and calyptoblastic hydroids, the trachymedusans and narcomedusans, the hydrocorallines, and the siphonophorans. The non-sexual individuals constitute the characteristic hydroids, of comparatively narrow and elongate form, often branching or aggregated in colonies. In this sense the group corresponds to the cryptocarpous discophorans of Eschscholtz, the Craspedota of Gegenbaur, the Cycloneura of Eimer, and the Hydroida or Hydroidea of various authors.

hydromedusan (hī″drō-mē-dū′san), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Hydromedusæ.

II. n. A member of the Hydromedusæ. Also hydromedusa.

Hydromedusinæ (hī-drō-mē-dū-sī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydromedusa + -inæ.] Same as Hydromedusæ.

hydromedusoid (hī″drō-mē-dū′soid), a. [< Hydromedusa + -oid.] Having the characters of the Hydromedusæ; resembling the Hydromedusæ.

hydromel (hī′drō-mel), n. [< F. hydromel = Sp. hidromel = Pg. hydromel = It. idromele, < L. hydromel, hydromeli, < Gr. ὑδρόμελι, a kind of mead made of water and honey, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μέλι = L. mel, honey.] A liquor consisting of honey diluted with water, fermented or unfermented: in the former case called vinous hydromel, and also mead.

As touching the mead called Hydromell, it consisted in times past of rain water, well purified, and hony.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxi. 6.

Hydromel, or water-hony, in long continuance will become wine. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 566.

In divers parts of Muscovy and some other northern regions, the common drink is hydromel, made of water fermented with honey; and indeed, if a due proportion betwixt those two be observed, and the fermentation be skillfully ordered, there may be that way, as experience hath assured us, prepared such a liquor, both for clearness, strength, and wholesomeness, as few that have not tasted such a one would believe.
Boyle, Usefulness of Nat. Philos., ii. 4.

They [British Gauls] drank beer and hydromel, which was carried about in metal beakers or jugs of earthenware. C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 122.

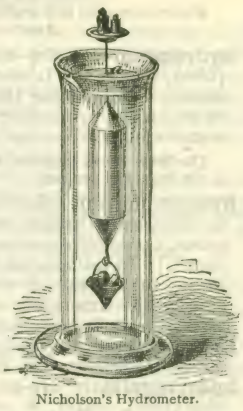
hydromeningitis (hī-drō-men-in-jī′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. meningitis, q. v.] In pathol., meningitis with serous effusion. See meningitis.

hydrometallurgy (hī-drō-met′al-ėr-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + metallurgy.] The process of assaying or reducing ores by liquid reagents.



hydrometamorphism (hī-drō-met-a-môr′fizm), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. metamorphism.] A kind of metamorphism of igneous rocks brought about by water, in contradistinction to pyrometamorphism, or metamorphism of sedimentary rocks effected by heat.

hydrometeor (hī-drō-mē′tē-ọr), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + (NGr.) μετέωρον, a meteor: see meteor.] A meteor or atmospheric phenomenon dependent upon the vapor of water; in the plural, all the aqueous phenomena of the atmosphere, as rain, hail, snow, etc.

hydrometeorological (hī-drō-mē″tē-or-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< hydrometeorology + -ic-al.] Relating or pertaining to hydrometeorology.

hydrometeorology (hī-drō-mē″tē-ō-rol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μετεωρολογία, meteorology: see meteorology. Cf. hydrometeor.] That branch of meteorology which is concerned with water in the atmosphere in the form of rain, ★clouds, snow, hail, etc.

hydrometer (hī-drom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑδρομέτριον, a vessel for measuring hydrostatically, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μέτρον, a measure.] 1. An instrument for measuring specific gravity, especially that of water and other fluids, and hence the strength of spirituous liquors and of various solutions. In Nicholson's hydrometer for solids (see cut) the weight is first determined which, placed in the upper pan, will depress the instrument to the zero-mark (a); then the weights are found which are needed to do this when the body experimented upon is placed, first in the upper and then in the lower pan. The difference between these last weights and that first found gives the weight of the body in air and in water respectively, whence the specific gravity is calculated in the usual manner. The common type of hydrometer for liquids consists of a glass tube with a graduated stem of uniform diameter, a bulb to cause it to float in the liquid, and a weight or counterpoise to cause the stem to stand upright as it floats. From the reading of the scale at the point which is on a level with the surface of the liquid in which it is floating, the specific gravity is ascertained either directly or by a simple calculation. Scales in common use are those of Baumé, as applicable to liquids either more or less dense than water; in the former case the zero is near the top, and in the latter near the bottom of the stem; the graduation is conventional, and the specific gravity is obtained from the reading by means of a series of tables. Another form is that of Tweddell. Hydrometers constructed to measure the purity, density, or degree of concentration of particular liquids receive special names, as alcoholometer, lactometer, etc.

Nicholson's Hydrometer.

Common Form of Hydrometer for liquids, in hydrometer-glass.

2. An instrument used for measuring the velocity or discharge of water, as in rivers, from reservoirs, etc.

Hydrometra1 (hī-drom′e-trä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μέτρον, a measure.] The typical genus of the family Hydrometridæ. The European H. stagnorum and the American H. lineata are examples. The genus as originally established by Fabricius (1796) was divided by Latreille (1807) into Hydrometra proper, Gerris, and Velia.

hydrometra2 (hī-drō-mē′trä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μήτρα, uterus.] In pathol., catarrhal endometritis.

There sometimes exists a form of catarrhal inflammation of the lining membrane of the uterus, giving rise to a mucous or muco-purulent secretion. . . . If the fluid is watery, this is called hydrometra.
R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 180.

hydrometric (hī-drō-met′rik), a. [As hydrometer + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to a hydrometer, or to the determination of the specific gravity, velocity, discharge, etc., of fluids.—2. Made by means of a hydrometer: as, hydrometric observations.—Hydrometric pendulum, an instrument consisting of a hollow ball suspended from the center of a graduated quadrant, and held in a stream to mark by its deflection the velocity of the current; a current-gage.

hydrometrid (hī-drom′e-trid), n. An insect of the family Hydrometridæ.

Hydrometridæ (hī-drō-met′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < *Hydrometra*1 + -idæ.] A family of heteropterous insects with long legs fitted for walking on the water, typified by the genus Hydrometra. The family formerly included the genus Hydrometra in a broad sense, but the genera Velia and Gerris are now removed to other families. Species of the restricted family are frequently observed on the surface of pools and streams, where they walk with the very slender body elevated upon their long legs, but do not swim in the water like the true water-bugs, Hydrocoriæ. Also called Hydrometrides, Hydrometrina, and Hydrometrites.

hydrometrograph (hī-drō-met′rō-gràf), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μέτρον, a measure, + γράφειν, write, record.] An instrument for determining and recording the quantity of water discharged from an orifice in a given time.

hydrometry (hī-drom′e-tri), n. [As hydrometer + -y.] The art or operation of determining by means of hydrometers the specific gravity, density, velocity, etc., of fluids.

hydromica (hī-drō-mī′kä), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. mica, q. v.] A variety of potash-mica which contains more water than ordinary muscovite, and is less elastic. See mica.

hydromicaceous (hī″drō-mī-kā′shius), a. [< hydromica + -aceous.] Of the nature of hydromica; containing hydromica.

Hydromicaceous and argillaceous schists.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXX. 282.

hydromotor (hī-drō-mō′tor), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. motor, motor.] A form of motor, designed for the propulsion of vessels, in which the propelling power is that of jets of water ejected from the sides or stern.

The little vessel supplied with the hydromotor met with a fair degree of success. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 47.

hydromphalum (hī-drom′fa-lum), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδρόμφαλος, having water in the umbilical regions, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ὀμφαλός, boss, knob, navel.] In pathol., an accumulation of serous liquid in the sac of an umbilical hernia, or simply the extension of the umbilicus by ascites. Also hydromphalon.

hydromyd (hī′drō-mid), n. An animal of the genus Hydromys. E. Blyth.

hydromyelia (hī″drō-mī-ē′li-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μυελός, marrow.] In pathol., the distention of the central canal or ventricular cavity of the spinal cord with a serous liquid. See hydrorachis. Also hydromyelus.

Hydromyinæ (hī″drō-mi-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydromys + -inæ.] A subfamily of rodents of the family Muridæ, of which the type is the genus Hydromys, and in which the teeth are only 12 in number.

Hydromys (hī′drō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of rodents constituting the subfamily Hydromyinæ, confined to the Australian region, where the species are known as water-rats and beaver-rats. H. chrysogaster is an example. Geoffroy, 1805. See cut under beaver-rat.

hydromysta, hydromystes (hī-drō-mis′tạ, -tēz), n. [< LGr. ὑδρομύστης, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + μύστης, one who initiates: see mystagogue.] In the early church, a presbyter or cleric who sprinkled with holy water the people entering or leaving a church.

hydronaphthol (hī-drō-naf′thol), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. naphthol.] An antiseptic preparation, probably one of the naphthols, prepared from naphthalene. [Trade-name.]

Hydronemateæ (hī″drō-nē-mā′tē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1823), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + νῆμα (τ-), a thread, + -eæ.] In bot., same as Algæ.

hydronephelite (hī-drō-nef′e-līt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + nephelite, q. v.] A hydrous silicate of aluminium and sodium, related to thomsonite in composition, and derived from the alteration of elæolite (nephelite).

hydronephrosis (hī″drō-nef-rō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + νεφρός, kidney, + -osis.] In pathol., a condition produced by obstruction of the outflow of the urine through the ureter, so that the ureter and the renal pelvis become greatly distended.

hydronephrotic (hī″drō-nef-rot′ik), a. Pertaining to or affected with hydronephrosis.

hydronette (hī′drō-net), n. [< F. hydronette, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -n-, a mere insertion, + -ette.] 1. A syringe.—2. A portable force-pump for use in gardens and conservatories.

Hydroparastatæ (hī″drō-pa-ras′tā-tē), n. pl. [< LGr. ὑδροπαραστάται, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + παραστάτης, one who stands by, an assistant: see parastatic.] A sect which separated from the early church in the latter part of the second century: so named from their use of water only, instead of wine and water, in the eucharist. Also called Aquarians and Encratites.

hydropath (hī′drō-path), n. [< hydropath-y.] ★Same as hydropathist.

hydropathic, hydropathical (hī-drō-path′ik, -i-kạl), a. [< hydropathy + -ic-al.] Relating to hydropathy.

hydropathist (hī-drop′ạ-thist), n. [< hydropathy + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in or practises hydropathy.—2. One who believes in the efficacy of hydropathic treatment.

He has tried both hydropathy and homœopathy; . . . has now settled into a confirmed hydropathist.
G. A. Sala, Dutch Pictures.

hydropathy (hī-drop′ạ-thi), n. [= F. hydropathie; a name formed after the supposed analogy of homeopathy, allopathy, etc., and intended to signify 'water-cure' or 'water-treatment'; < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πάθος, suffering, disease.] The method of treating diseases by the external and internal use of water; hydrotherapeutics, especially in the cruder forms. See water-cure.

hydropericardium (hī-drō-per-i-kär′di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + περικάρδιον, pericardium.] In pathol., the accumulation of serous liquid in the pericardial cavity. Also called hydrocardia.

hydroperitoneum (hī-drō-per″i-tō-nē′um), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + περιτόναιον, peritoneum.] In pathol., the effusion of lymph into the peritoneal cavity; ascites.

hydrophane (hī′drō-fān), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φανός, clear, < φαίνειν, show, shine.] A partly translucent whitish or light-colored variety of opal, which absorbs water upon immersion and then becomes transparent. Also called oculus mundi.

hydrophanous (hī-drof′ạ-nus), a. [As hydrophane + -ous.] Made transparent by immersion in water. See hydrophane.

Hydrophasianus (hī-drō-fā-si-ā′nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φασιανός, a pheasant.] A genus of jacanas, of the family Parridæ or Jacanidæ, established by Wagler in 1832, containing the Asiatic water-pheasant or pheasant-tailed jacana, H. chirurgus. See Jacana.

Asiatic Water-pheasant (Hydrophasianus chirurgus).

hydrophid (hī′drō-fid), n. A venomous sea-snake of the family Hydrophidæ.

Hydrophidæ (hī-drof′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrophis + -idæ.] A family of ophidians of the suborder Proteroglypha, with permanently erect poison-fangs, and the tail compressed and fin-like, and thus fitted for swimming; the sea-snakes, or marine venomous serpents. These snakes inhabit the Indian ocean and tropical parts of the Pacific, and are extremely poisonous. There are several genera, as Hydrophis, Platurus, and Pelamis.

hydrophile (hī′drō-fil), n. [< NL. Hydrophilus.] A water-beetle of the genus Hydrophilus, or one of the Hydrophilidæ.

hydrophilid (hī-drof′i-lid), n. One of the Hydrophilidæ.

Hydrophilidæ (hī-drō-fil′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hydrophilus + -idæ.] A family of clavicorn beetles, with numerous genera and species. The dorsabdominal segments are partly membranous; the ventral segments are free; at least one pair of tarsi are 5-jointed; the palpi are distant at base; and the angles of the large quadrate mentum are not prolonged. The same or a corresponding group of water-loving beetles is called Hydrophilida, Hydrophili, Hydrophilii, Hydrophilini, Hydrophilites, or Hydrophilioidea. See also cut under Hydrobius.

Hydrophilus piceus.
A, larva; B, pupa; C, imago. (About natural size.)

hydrophilite (hī-drof′i-līt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φίλος, loving, + *-ite*2.] Native calcium ★chlorid. Also called chlorocalcite.

hydrophilous (hī-drof′i-lus), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φίλος, loving.] In bot., pollinated by the agency of water. Compare anemophilous, entomophilous.

Hydrophilus (hī-drof′i-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φίλος, loving.] The typical genus of Hydrophilidæ. It contains the largest beetles of the family, such as the giant water-beetle, H. triangularis, a common North American species, of a shining black color, 1½ inches long. The corresponding European species is H. piceus. Also called Hydrogoma.

Hydrophis (hī′drō-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ὄφις, a snake.] The typical genus of Hydrophidæ or sea-snakes. One of the commonest sea-snakes is the chital, H. cyaneicincta, which attains a length of 5 or 6 feet, and is of a greenish color becoming yellowish below, with numerous transverse black blotches.

Hydrophis cyaneicincta.

hydrophite (hī′drō-fīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ὄφις, snake, + *-ite*2.] A massive mineral of a green color. It is a hydrous silicate of iron and magnesium, allied to deweylite and to serpentine.

hydrophobe (hī′drō-fōb), n. [= F. hydrophobe = Sp. hidrófobo = Pg. hydrophobo = It. idrofobo, < L. hydrophobus, < Gr. ὑδροφόβος, having a horror of water: see hydrophobia.] One who is suffering from hydrophobia.

hydrophobia (hī-drō-fō′bi-ạ), n. [Also hydrophoby, formerly hydrophobie, < F. hydrophobie = Sp. hidrofobia = Pg. hydrophobia = It. idrofobia; < LL. hydrophobia, < Gr. ὑδροφοβία, a horror of water caused by the bite of a mad dog, < ὑδροφόβος, having a horror of water, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φέβεσθαι, fear, φόβος, fear.] In pathol.: (a) A symptom of rabies in man, consisting in a furious aversion to liquids and an inability to swallow them. See rabies. Hence —(b) Rabies, especially in human beings.

Athenodorus . . . writeth that not only the . . . leprosie, but also the hydrophobie—that is to say, the fear of water occasioned by the biting of a mad dog—were first discovered in the days of Asclepiades.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 638.

(c) Any morbid or unnatural dread of water, such as may exist independently of rabies.

hydrophobic (hī-drō-fō′bik), a. [< LL. hydrophobicus, < Gr. ὑδροφοβικός, < ὑδροφοβία, hydrophobia: see hydrophobia.] Of, pertaining to, or affected with hydrophobia or rabies; rabid.

There are people who deny the existence of hydrophobic infection. The American, VI. 277.

hydrophobophobia (hī-drō-fō-bō-fō′bi-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδροφοβία, hydrophobia, + -φοβία, fear, as in hydrophobia, q. v.] In pathol., a morbid condition produced by excessive dread of rabies, which may simulate its real or supposed symptoms.

hydrophoby (hī′drō-fō-bi), n. [See hydrophobia.] Hydrophobia. [Rare.]

They set up the long howl of hydrophoby at my principles. Coleridge, To Sir George Beaumont.

Hydrophora (hī-drof′ō-rạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑδροφόρος, carrying water: see hydrophore.] One of the three divisions into which Huxley and other authors divide the Hydrozoa, the other two being the Discophora and the Siphonophora. The members are, in all cases except that of Hydra, fixed ramified hydrosomes, on which many hydranths and gonophores are developed. The tentacles are either scattered over the hydranths or arranged in one circle round the mouth, or in two circles, one close to the mouth and one near the aboral end. Very generally—for example, in all Sertularüidæ and Tubulariidæ—there is a hard chitinous cuticular skeleton or cœnosarc, which usually gives rise to hydrothecæ, into which the hydranths can be retracted. The gonophores present every variety, from sacs to free-swimming medusoids. The inner margin of the bell in these medusoids is always produced into a velum, and otolithic sacs and eye-spots are very generally disposed at regular intervals round the circumference of the bell. The great majority of what are sometimes termed the naked-eyed medusæ, Gymnophthalmata, are simply the free-swimming gonophores of Hydrophora.

hydrophoran (hī-drof′ō-ran), a. and n. I. a. Having the characters of the Hydrophora; pertaining to the Hydrophora.

★ II. n. One of the Hydrophora.

hydrophore (hī′drō-fōr), n. [< Gr. ὑδροφόρος, carrying water, < ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*1.] An instrument for obtaining specimens of water from any desired depth below the surface.

hydrophorous (hī-drof′ō-rus), a. Pertaining to the Hydrophora.

hydrophthalmia (hī-drof-thal′mi-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] In pathol., an increase in the quantity of either the aqueous or the vitreous humor. Dunglison.—Hydrophthalmia anterior. Same as buphthalmos.

hydrophthalmy (hī′drof-thal-mi), n. Same as hydrophthalmia. [Rare.]

Hydrophyceæ (hī-drō-fī′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1825), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φῦκος, a seaweed (see fucus), + -eæ.] In bot., same as Algæ.

Hydrophyllaceæ (hī″drō-fi-lā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Hydrophyllum + -aceæ.]

A family of plants, the waterleaf family, consisting mostly of herbs, or rarely shrubs, with a watery insipid juice, alternate or rarely opposite leaves, no stipules, mostly scorpioid inflorescence, regular pentamerous and pentandrous flowers, with the stamens borne on the lower part of the corolla and alternate with its lobes, a dimerous ovary, and 2 distinct styles. There are 16 genera and about 160 species, most of which are North American. Called Hydroleaceæ by Robert Brown in 1810.

Hydrophylleæ (hī-drō-fil'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Hydrophyllum + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Hydrophyllaceæ, differing from the other tribes in having the corolla-lobes often contorted.

hydrophyllia, n. Plural of hydrophyllium.

hydrophylliaceous (hī-drō-fil-i-ā'shius), a. [‹ Hydrophyllium + -aceous.] Having the characters of a hydrophyllium.

hydrophyllium (hī-drō-fil'i-um), n.; pl. hydrophyllia (-ä). [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf.] The peculiar protective envelop or hydrotheca of the hydranths of some oceanic hydrozoans, as the Siphonophora, of laminar or foliaceous character. Also called bract.

Detached Hydrophyllia of Athorybia rosacea, a siphonophorous hydrozoan.

hydrophylls (hī'drō-filz), n. pl. [(Lindley, 1846) ‹ Hydrophyllum.] Lindley's name for the waterleaf family, the Hydrophyllaceæ.

Hydrophyllum (hī-drō-fil'um), n. [NL. (Tournefort) (so called because of a cavity in each leaf which holds a small quantity of water), ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, the type genus of the family Hydrophyllaceæ and tribe Hydrophylleæ. They are characterized by having the calyx nearly open, with or without a small appendage at each sinus; the corolla campanulate, the tube within bearing a linear longitudinal appendage opposite each lobe, with infolded edges forming a nectariferous groove; filaments and style long-exserted; ample petioled leaves; and the flowers white or pale-blue, and cymose. Only 6 or 8 species are known, all natives of North America. They are all called waterleaf.

Waterleaf (Hydrophyllum Virginicum). a, flower; b, fruit.

hydrophysocele (hī-drō-fī'sō-sēl), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φῦσα, a bellows, a bubble, + κήλη, a tumor.] In pathol., a hernia containing both serous fluids and gas.

Hydrophyta (hī-drof'i-tä), n. pl. [NL. (Lyngbye, 1819), ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φυτόν, a plant.] 1. A name proposed as a substitute for the word Algæ. The word has never been much used, and is, moreover, objectionable, since not all submerged plants are algæ, and it is not applicable to aërial forms.

hydrophyte (hī'drō-fīt), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φυτόν, a plant.] A plant which grows in water; an aquatic plant.

hydrophytography (hī″drō-fī-tog'ra-fi), n. [As hydrophyte + Gr. -γραφία, ‹ γράφειν, write.] The description of water-plants. [Rare.]

hydrophytology (hī″drō-fī-tol'ō-ji), n. [As hydrophyte + Gr. -λογία, ‹ λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of botany which relates to aquatic ★plants.

hydrophyton (hī-drof'i-ton), n.; pl. hydrophyta (-tä). [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + φυτόν, a plant.] In the hydroid acalephs, the common support by which the several zoöids of a colony are connected one with another. The base or proximal end of the hydrophyton is the hydrorhiza; the intermediate part between the hydrorhiza and the hydranth is the hydrocaulus.

hydrophytous (hī-drof'i-tus), a. [As hydrophyton + -ous.] Having the character of a hydrophyton.

hydropic (hī-drop'ik), a. and n. [‹ ME. ydropik, ‹ OF. hydropique, idropique, F. hydropique = Sp. hidrópico = Pg. hydropico = It. idropico, ‹ L. hydropicus, ‹ Gr. ὑδρωπικός, dropsical, ‹ ὑδρωψ, dropsy: see hydropsy, dropsy.] I. a. Containing or produced by water; dropsical.

Drye folk & ydropike, & dede at the laste;
Alle called on that cortayse & claymed his grace.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1096.

Hydropick humors not discernable at first from a fair and juicy fleshinesse of body.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

Every lust is a kind of hydropic distemper, and the more we drink the more we shall thirst. Tillotson.

II. n 1. A medicine that relieves or cures dropsy.—2. A dropsical person.

hydropical (hī-drop'i-kạl), a. [‹ hydropic + -al.] Same as hydropic.

Waterish or hydropical tumours are the effects of an extravasated serum. Wiseman, Surgery, i. 23.

hydropically (hī-drop'i-kạl-i), adv. In a hydropical or dropsical manner.

It may I confess by siccity and astriction afford a confirmation unto parts relaxed, and such as be hydropically disposed. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 3.

hydropisy†, n. An earlier form of hydropsy.

hydroplanula (hī-drō-plan'ū-lä), n.; pl. hydroplanulæ (-lē). [NL., ‹ Hydra, a genus of hydrozoans, + planula, a stage of the embryo.] The transitional stage of the embryo of a hydrozoan intermediate between the planula and the tentaculated actinula.

hydropneumatic (hī″drō-nū-mat'ik), a. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πνευματικός, of or caused by wind or air: see pneumatic.] Of or pertaining to, or produced by, the action of water and air; involving the combined action of water and air or gas.—Hydropneumatic accumulator. See accumulator.

hydropneumonia (hī″drō-nū-mō'ni-ä), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. pneumonia, q. v.] In pathol., dropsy or edema of the lungs.

hydropneumopericardium (hī-drō-nū-mō-per-i-kär'di-um), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πνεῦμα, breath, wind (cf. πνείμων, lung), + περικάρδιον, pericardium.] In pathol., the presence of serous fluid and air in the pericardial cavity.

hydropneumothorax (hī-drō-nū-mō-thō'raks), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + NL. pneumothorax, q. v.] In pathol., the presence of air ★and serous fluid in a pleural cavity.

hydropolyp (hī'drō-pol-ip), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πολύπους, polyp: see polyp.] A hydroid polyp; a hydrozoan, as distinguished from a coral polyp or actinozoan.

Hydropolypinæ (hī-drō-pol-i-pī'nē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πολύπους, polyp, + -inæ.] A suborder of Hydromedusæ, multiplying by budding and by sexual products which do not appear in the shape of medusæ. The budding polyps may be disintegrated from the parent and so all remain solitary, or they may remain attached and so form a colony. In both cases sexual multiplication alternates with the process of budding. The sexual products are matured in the wall of the body-cavity, which may form hollow tentacular processes in which the ova and spermatozoa are found.

hydropropulsion (hī″drō-prō-pul'shọn), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. propulsion.] Propulsion of vessels by a hydromotor.

hydrops (hī'drops), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδρωψ, dropsy, ‹ ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water: see hydro-. Cf. hydropsy.] Same as hydropsy.—Hydrops of the anterior chamber. Same as buphthalmos.

hydropsy (hī'drop-si), n. [Earlier hydropisy, ‹ F. hydropisie = Sp. hidropesía = Pg. hydropesia, hydropisia = It. idropisia, ‹ L. hydropisis, for hydropiasis*, ‹ Gr. ὑδρωπίασις, dropsy, ‹ ὑδρωπιᾶν, have the dropsy, ‹ ὑδρωψ, dropsy: see hydrops.] Dropsy: the original form, of which dropsy is a contraction.

Soft-swoln and pale, here lay the Hydropsy:
Unwieldy man; with belly monstrous round.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i. 75.

Hydropsyche (hī-drop-sī'kē), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ψυχή, a butterfly: see Psyche.] The typical genus of Hydropsychidæ.

Hydropsychidæ (hī-drop-sik'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Curtis, 1835), ‹ Hydropsyche + -idæ.] A family of trichopterous insects, or caddis-flies, typified by the genus Hydropsyche, having the third joint of the maxillary palpi elongate and filiform, the antennæ setaceous, and the feet spurred. The larvæ are aquatic and predaceous, and inhabit stationary cases.

Hydropterideæ (hī-drop-te-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πτερίς or πτέρις (-ιδ-), a fern, + -eæ.] A class or group of cryptogamous plants, the heterosporous Filicales, comprising the families Marsileaceæ and Salviniaceæ, which are characterized by possessing both macrospores and microspores. Also called Rhizocarpeæ. They are now classed with the ferns.

hydroptic (hī-drop'tik), a. [Irreg. ‹ hydropsy + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with hydropsy; dropsical; hence, thirsty. [Rare.]

This I made account that I begun early, when I understood the study of our laws; but was diverted by the worst voluptuousness, which is an hydroptic immoderate desire of human learning and languages. Donne, Letters, xx.

He, soul-hydroptic with a sacred thirst,
Sucked at the flagon.
Browning, Grammarian's Funeral.

Hydroptila (hī-drop'ti-lä), n. [NL. (Dalman, 1819), ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πτίλον, down, feathers.] The typical genus of caddis-flies of the family Hydroptilidæ, having ocelli, scarcely acuminate wings, and the head with elevated lobes posteriorly.

Hydroptilidæ (hī-drop-til'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Stephens, 1836), ‹ Hydroptila + -idæ.] A family of trichopterous insects, or caddis-flies, typified by the genus Hydroptila, containing very minute forms which resemble microlepidopterous insects. They are very hairy, with simple palpi and short antennæ. The larvæ are found in both running and standing water, and build free membranous cases, to which a few grains of sand are sometimes added.

hydropult (hī'drō-pult), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. (cata)pult.] A portable force-pump; a garden-pump. Also hydrapult.

hydropyretic (hī″drō-pī-ret'ik), a. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + πυρετός, fever: see pyretic.] In pathol., of or pertaining to fever that is accompanied by sweating.

hydroquinone (hī-drō-kwī'nōn), n. [‹ hydro-(gen) + quinone.] A dibasic phenol ($C_6H_4(OH)_2$) prepared by the oxidation of aniline and treatment of the quinone formed with sulphurous acid. It is a crystalline substance with a sweet taste, and is readily soluble in hot water. It is much used in place of pyrogallic acid as an agent for the development of photographic plates. Also hydrochinon and ericinone, and more properly 1, 4-phendiol.

Hydroquinone belongs to a class of organic bodies that the chemist calls diphenols. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 376.

hydrorachis, hydrorrhachis (hī-dror'a-kis), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ῥάχις, spine.] In pathol., serous effusion in the spinal canal. When this is in cavities within the spinal cord it is called hydrorachis interna, or hydromyelia; when between the cord and the walls of the canal, hydrorachis externa. Hydrorachis alone usually denotes hydrorachis externa.

hydrorhiza (hī-drō-rī'zä), n.; pl. hydrorhizæ (-zē). [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ῥίζα, root.] The corm or rootstock of a fixed hydrozoan; the common base of a colony of hydroids, by which it is attached to some support.

The base begins to divide up and send out processes. These latter grow and ramify in a manner strikingly like that of the roots of a tree, and produce what is technically known as the hydrorhiza. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 78.

hydrorhizal (hī-drō-rī'zạl), a. [‹ hydrorhiza + -al.] Having the character of a hydrorhiza; pertaining to a hydrorhiza.

hydrorhodonite (hī″drō-rō'dō-nīt), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. rhodonite.] A hydrated manganese silicate found at Långban in Sweden.

hydrorrhea, hydrorrhœa (hī-drō-rē'ä), n. [NL. hydrorrhœa, ‹ Gr. ὑδρόρροια, lit. a flowing of water, ‹ ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ῥοία, a flowing, ‹ ῥεῖν, flow.] In pathol., a copious watery discharge.

hydrosalpinx (hī-drō-sal'pingks), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + σάλπιγξ, a trumpet.] In pathol., the accumulation of serous liquid in a Fallopian tube.

hydrosarcocele (hī-drō-sär'kō-sēl), n. [‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + sarcocele, q. v.] In pathol., sarcocele attended with dropsy of the tunica vaginalis.

Hydrosaurus (hī-drō-sâ'rus), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + σαῦρος, lizard.] A notable genus of monitor-lizards, of the family Monitoridæ or Varanidæ: so named from their aquatic habits. H. salvator, the water-monitor, is said to attain a length of 8 feet; it inhabits India and the Malay peninsula, and is known there as the kabaragoya. An Australian species, H. giganteus, is known as ★the lace-lizard.

Water-monitor (Hydrosaurus salvator).

hydroscope (hī′drō-skōp), n. [= F. hydroscope = Pg. hydroscopo = It. idroscopo, < Gr. ὑδρωσκόπιον, a water-clock (cf. ὑδροσκόπος, seeking or finding water), < ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + σκοπεῖν, view.] 1. A kind of water-clock or instrument formerly used for measuring time, consisting of a cylindrical graduated tube, from which water slowly escaped through an aperture in the conical bottom, the subsidence of the water marking the lapse of time.—2. A hygroscope.

hydroselenate (hī-drō-sel′e-nāt), n. [< hydroselen-ic + -ate[1].] In chem., a salt formed by the union of hydroselenic acid with a salifiable base. Also called selenide.

hydroselenic (hī″drō-sē-len′ik), a. [< hydro(gen) + selen(ium) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a combination of hydrogen and selenium.—Hydroselenic acid, H_2Se, a colorless gas which resembles sulphureted hydrogen, but is much more offensive. Also called seleniureted hydrogen.

hydrosoma (hī-drō-sō′mä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + σῶμα, body.] 1. Pl. hydrosomata (-ma-tä). The entire body of a hydrozoan, usually compounded of several hydranths. Also hydrosome.

> In an early stage . . . every hydrozoön is represented by a single hydranth, . . . but, in many cases, the buds developed from the primary hydranth remain connected together by a common stem or cœnosarc, and thus give rise to a compound body, or hydrosoma.
> Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 117.

2. [cap.] In entom., same as Hydrophilus. Laporte, 1840.

hydrosomal (hī-drō-sō′mal), a. [< hydrosoma + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hydrosoma: as, a hydrosomal expansion; a hydrosomal layer. See extract under Millepora. Also hydrosomatous.

hydrosomata, n. Plural of hydrosoma, 1.

hydrosomatous (hī-drō-som′a-tus), a. Same as hydrosomal.

hydrosome (hī′drō-sōm), n. [< NL. hydrosoma.] Same as hydrosoma, 1.

hydrosphere (hī′drō-sfēr), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + σφαῖρα, sphere.] The aqueous envelop of the globe; the water existing on the surface of the globe and forming the transition between the atmosphere above and the lithosphere below; as used by some, the aqueous vapor in the atmosphere.

hydrospire (hī′drō-spīr), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + σπεῖρα, a coil, a spire.] One of a system of lamellar tubes which lie between and below the ambulacra of some blastoid echinoderms, supposed to have been connected with the respiratory function.

> Pores on the antambulacral surface may be . . . arranged to form pectinated rhombs or hydrospires.
> Encyc. Brit., VII. 638.

Hydrostachyaceæ (hī-drō-sta-ki-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (S. de Jussieu), < Hydrostachys (-y-) + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, by some referred to the Podostemonaceæ and called Hydrostachydeæ or Hydrostachyeæ, containing the single genus Hydrostachys.

Hydrostachys (hī-dros′tā-kis), n. [NL. (Dupetit Thouars), < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + στάχυς, an ear of corn.] A small genus of aquatic herbs, family Hydrostachyaceæ. It has dicœcious flowers in dense spikes; the flowers naked; the male with 1 stamen, the female with a 1-celled ovary and 2 parietal placentæ; stem tubular; and leaves long, dilated at the base, and simply pinnatifid or pinnatisected. About 10 species are known, natives of Madagascar and Africa.

hydrostat (hī′drō-stat), n. [< Gr. ὑδροστάτης, a hydrostatic balance: see hydrostatic.] 1. An apparatus of any kind for preventing injury to a steam-boiler from low water.—2. An electrical device for detecting the presence of water, used as a protection against damage to buildings from overflow or leakage.

> The first hydrostat I constructed consisted of two sets of conductors running at angles to each other, and separated by a material which would act as an insulator when dry and become a conductor when wet.
> ★ Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXVI. 331.

hydrostatic (hī-drō-stat′ik), a. [= F. hydrostatique = Sp. hidrostático = Pg. hydrostatico = It. idrostatico, < NL. hydrostaticus (NGr. ὑδροστατικός), hydrostatic, < Gr. ὑδροστάτης, a hydrostatic balance, < ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + στατός, standing, > στατικός, causing to stand: see static.] Pertaining to or in accordance with the principles of the equilibrium of fluids; relating to hydrostatics. Also hydrostatical.—Hydrostatic acalephs, See Hydrostatica.—Hydrostatic arch, a linear arch suited for sustaining at each point a normal pressure, proportional, like the pressure of a liquid in repose, to the depth below a given horizontal plane.—Hydrostatic balance, a balance used for determining accurately the specific gravity of bodies by weighing them in water.—Hydrostatic bed. Same as water-bed.—Hydrostatic bellows, an apparatus contrived to illustrate the law of the distribution of pressure through liquids, viz. that when any part of the surface of a confined liquid is pressed by any force, every part of the surface of the confining vessel equal in area to that part of the liquid is pressed by an equal force. It generally consists of two circular boards connected by leather fastened closely round their edges, as in an ordinary bellows, and having a small upright tube communicating with the interior. If a quantity of water is poured into the bellows, and a weight is placed upon the upper board, the water in the tube will rise above the level of the water in the bellows; but a point will be reached where (on account of the above-mentioned principle) the pressure caused by the weight of the small quantity of water in the tube will balance that of the water in the bellows and of the weight; the higher the water in the tube the greater the weight that will be sustained by it. See hydraulic press, under hydraulic.—Hydrostatic joint, a joint used for large water-mains, and consisting essentially of a ring of sheet-lead, which is driven into the bell of the pipe by pressure applied to a liquid in an annular space within the bell. The liquid commonly used is tar, and it is left in the pipe after the joint is closed.—Hydrostatic paradox, the principle that any quantity of a perfect liquid, however small, may be made to balance any weight, however great. See hydrostatic bellows, above.—Hydrostatic press. Same as hydraulic press (which see, under hydraulic).—Hydrostatic weighing-machine, a machine operating upon the same hydrostatic principle as the hydrostatic bellows, which latter may be considered as such a machine. The weight of a body is indicated by or inferred from the height of a column of distilled water, at a temperature of 4° C., which holds the body to be weighed in equilibrium.

Hydrostatic Bellows.
a, funnel-mouthed tube; b, box with flexible sides; c, weight.

Hydrostatica† (hī-drō-stat′i-kạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of hydrostaticus: see hydrostatic.] In Cuvier's system of classification, the second order of Acalepha, distinguished from the simple acalephs by having one or more vessels filled with air, by means of which they suspend themselves in the water. The term is not now used; the group corresponds to the Siphonophora or oceanic hydrozoans, orders Physophora and Calycophora.

hydrostatical (hī-drō-stat′i-kạl), a. [< hydrostatic + -al.] Same as hydrostatic.

> But this scarce evitable imperfection of hydrostatical and the like experiments does not hinder, but that by their help we may make good estimates of the weights and bulks of very many bodies. Boyle, Works, V. 455.

hydrostatically (hī-drō-stat′i-kal-i), adv. According to hydrostatics or to hydrostatic principles.

hydrostatician (hī″drō-stā-tish′an), n. [< hydrostatic + -ian. Cf. statician.] One who is versed in hydrostatics.

> It is known to hydrostaticians that, according to a theorem of Archimedes, the weight of a body belonging to that kind may be gathered from the weight of the water that is equal in magnitude to that part of the body that is immersed in that liquor, when the solid floats freely upon it. Boyle, Works, VI. 482.

hydrostatics (hī-drō-stat′iks), n. [Pl. of hydrostatic: see -ics.] The mathematical theory of the pressure and equilibrium of incompressible fluids.

hydrostomia (hī-drō-stō′mi-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + στόμα, mouth.] In pathol., excessive secretion of fluids into the mouth. The Lancet, No. 3413, p. 161.

hydrosudopathy (hī″drō-sū-dop′a-thi), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + L. sudare, sweat (sudor, n., sweating), + Gr. πάθος, suffering: see hydropathy.] The treatment of diseases by ★cold water and sweating.

hydrosulphid (hī-drō-sul′fid), n. [< hydro(gen) + sulphid.] Same as sulphid.

hydrosulphuret (hī-drō-sul′fū-ret), n. [< hydro(gen) + sulphuret.] Same as sulphid or sulphuret.

hydrosulphureted, hydrosulphuretted (hī-drō-sul′fū-ret-ed), a. [< hydrosulphuret + -ed[2].] Combined with sulphureted hydrogen.

hydrosulphurous (hī-drō-sul′fėr-us), a. [< hydro(gen) + sulphur + -ous.] Compounded of hydrogen and sulphur.—Hydrosulphurous acid†, hyposulphurous acid, $H_2S_2O_4$ or H_2SO_2.

hydrotachylyte (hī-drō-tak′i-līt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. tachylyte.] A variety of tachylyte containing as much as 15 per cent. of water.

hydrotalcite (hī-drō-tal′sīt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. talcite.] In mineral., same as houghite.

hydrotellurate (hī-drō-tel′ū-rāt), n. [< hydrotellur(ic) + -ate[1].] In chem., a salt formed by the combination of an acid composed of hydrotelluric acid with a base; a telluride.

hydrotelluric (hī″drō-te-lū′rik), a. [< hydro(gen) + tellur(ium) + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from hydrogen and tellurium.

hydrotheca (hī-drō-thē′kạ), n.; pl. hydrothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. ὑδροθήκη, a reservoir of water, < ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + θήκη, a case, receptacle: see theca.] In zoöl., a little chitinous cup in which each polypite of the Sertularida and Campanularida is protected; a calycle. See cut under Campanularia.

> In many Hydrozoa, the ectoderm gives rise to a hard cuticular coating, and in some of these (Campanularidæ, Sertularidæ), this cuticular investment, on the hydranth, takes the shape of a case or "cell"—the hydrotheca—into which the hydranth may be more or less completely retracted. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 117 hydrothecal (hī-drō-thē′kạl), a. [< hydrotheca + -al.] Having the character of hydrotheca; calycular.

hydrotherapeutic (hī-drō-ther-ạ-pū′tik), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. therapeutic.] Of or pertaining to hydrotherapeutics: as, hydrotherapeutic treatment.

hydrotherapeutics (hī-drō-ther-ạ-pū′tiks), n. [Pl. of hydrotherapeutic: see -ics.] The use of water in various ways and at various temperatures for therapeutic purposes.

hydrotherapy (hī-drō-ther′ạ-pi), n. [= F. hydrothérapie = Sp. hidroterapia, < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + θεραπεία, cure, < θεραπεύειν, cure.] Same as hydrotherapeutics.

hydrothermal (hī-drō-thėr′mal), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + θερμός, hot.] Of or relating to heated water: specifically applied to the action of heated waters in producing geological changes by dissolving mineral substances and redepositing them when cooled.

hydrothorax (hī-drō-thō′raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + θώραξ, the chest.] In pathol., the presence of serous fluid in one or ★both pleural cavities.

hydrotic† (hī-drot′ik), a. and n. [Properly hidrotic, < Gr. ἱδρωτικός, < ἱδρώς, sweat.] I. a. Sudorific.

II. n. In med., a sudorific.

hydrotical† (hī-drot′i-kạl), a. [< hydrotic + -al.] Same as hydrotic.

hydrotimeter (hī-drō-tim′e-tėr), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑδρότης, moisture, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument used in the determination of the hardness of water. It consists of a tube so graduated that an alcoholic soap-solution of standard strength contained in 23 divisions of it shall give a permanent lather with 40 cubic centimeters of a solution of calcium chlorid of standard strength. Each one of these divisions is called a degree, and in saying that "the water does not exceed 8 degrees hydrotimeter," it is meant that not more than 8 divisions of the standard soap-solution delivered from the hydrotimeter is necessary to make a permanent lather with 40 cubic centimeters of the water in question.

hydrotitanite (hī-drō-tī′tạn-īt), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. titanite, q. v.] A hydrated alteration product of the perofskite of Magnet Cove in Arkansas.

hydrotrophe (hī′drō-trōf), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + τρέφειν, thicken, congeal, nourish.] An apparatus for raising water by means of condensing steam in chambers. It is similar in principle to the pulsometer, aquometer, etc. ★E. H. Knight.

hydrotropic (hī-drō-trop′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + τρόπος, a turn.] Pertaining to or affected by hydrotropism.

hydrotropism (hī-drot′rō-pizm), n. [As hydrotrop-ic + -ism.] A state induced in a growing organ by the influence of moisture, in which under certain conditions it turns toward the moisture, and under other little understood conditions it turns away from the moisture. Organs which curve so as to apply themselves to the moist surfaces are termed positively hydrotropic; those which are induced to curve away from the dampness are termed negatively hydrotropic.

hydrous (hī′drus), a. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + -ous.] 1. Containing water; watery.—2. ★Containing hydrogen.

hydroxid, hydroxide (hī-drok′sid, -sid or -sīd), n. [< Gr. ὑδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. oxid.] A metallic or basic radical combined with one or more hydroxyl groups: as, potassium hydroxid, KOH; ethyl hydroxid, C_2H_5OH. Hydroxids may be regarded as formed from water (HOH), by the substitution for one of its hydrogen atoms of a metal or basic radical. An acid radical combined with hydroxyl is called an acid, the term hydroxid being reserved for basic compounds. Also spelled hydroxyd, hydroxyde.

hydroxyl (hī-drok′sil), n. [< hydr(ogen) + ox(ygen) + -yl.] A compound radical (OH) which in the isolated state is known as hydrogen dioxid or peroxid, $(HO)_2$ or H_2O_2. Thus, the oxygen bases are regarded as compounds of hydroxyl with electropositive atoms or radicals, as sodium hydroxid, NaOH. The oxygen acids are also regarded as compounds of hydroxyl with electronegative atoms or radicals, as sulphuric acid, $SO_2(OH)_2$. Water may be regarded as hydrogen hydroxid, HOH.

hydrozinkite (hī-drō-zing′kīt), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + E. zinkite.] A hydrous zinc carbonate occurring in massive earthy forms of a white or nearly white color.

Hydrozoa (hī-drō-zō′ạ), n. pl. [NL., pl. of hydrozoön, q. v.] A class of Cœlenterata, one of two prime divisions of that subkingdom, Actinozoa being the other. The Hydrozoa are aquatic and chiefly marine organisms, single or oftener compound, and nearly always soft and gelatinous (in some cases with a chitinous perisarc). Each individual polypite consists essentially of a simple sac composed of an outer (ectodermal) and an inner (endodermal) membrane, with a simple gastrovascular cavity or stomach-sac, not differentiated into an esophageal tube nor separated from the general body-cavity, developed as an outward process of the body-wall, and usually furnished with tentacular processes. The reproductive organs are external to the body. Reproduction is accomplished either by sexual elements (ova and spermatozoa) or by gemmation or fission; the generative zoöids are developed as medusoid organisms, which may become detached and free-swimming, or remain permanently attached to the parent stock. The class is of world-wide distribution, and includes the numerous creatures known as hydroids, acalephs, medusans, jelly-fish, sea-blubbers, etc. Their forms are endlessly varied, and range in complexity from the simple fresh-water hydra to the complicated structure of the oceanic hydroids, as the Portuguese man-of-war. The classification of the Hydrozoa varies with different writers, and it is difficult to define most of the larger groups into which they have been divided. They are separated into from three to six groups, as the Hydrophora, Discophora, and Siphonophora of Huxley's arrangement, or the Hydroida, Siphonophora, Lucernarida, Discophora, Graptolitidæ, and Hydrocorallinæ of Nicholson's arrangement. The class is sometimes called Polypomedusæ. It was named as a class of Polypi by Owen in 1843.

1, hydra; 2, sertularian; 3, calycophoran; 4, physophoridan; 5, lucernarian. I, II, III, IV, successive stages of a medusiform gonophore, or medusoid. In any figure: a, ectoderm; b, endoderm; c, digestive and somatic cavity; A, air-vesicle; B, hydrophyllium; C, hydrotheca; F, pneumatophore; G, gonophore; N, nectocalyx; P, tentaculum; S, hydranth; T, cœnosarc.

hydrozoal (hī-drō-zō′ạl), a. [< hydrozoön + -al.] Pertaining to or resembling the Hydrozoa; hydrozoan.

> The theca of hydrozoal polypes. Huxley.

hydrozoan (hī-drō-zō′an), a. and n. [< hydrozoön + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Hydrozoa; resembling the Hydrozoa, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hydrozoa, as an acaleph, medusan, or jelly-fish.

hydrozoic (hī-drō-zō′ik), a. [< hydrozoön + -ic.] Of the nature of Hydrozoa; hydrozoan.

> As a question of development, the formation of the radiate Echinoderm within its vermiform larva seems to me to be analogous to the formation of a radiate Medusa upon a Hydrozoic stock. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 282.

hydrozoön (hī-drō-zō′on), n.; pl. hydrozoa (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + ζῷον, an animal: see zoön.] A hydrozoan.

Hydrureæ (hī-drö′rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Meneghini, 1838), < Hydrurus + -eæ.] A former division of fresh-water algæ, of the old order Coccophyceæ, typified by the genus Hydrurus. This division is no longer accepted, the genera being now referred to various groups.

hydruret† (hī′drọ-ret), n. [< hydr(ogen) + -uret.] Same as hydrid[1].

hydruria (hī-drö′ri-ạ), n. [< Gr. ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., an excessive flow of watery urine.

Hydrurus (hī-drö′rus), n. [NL. (Agardh, 1824), < Gr. ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water, + οὐρά, a tail.] A genus of simple organisms most recently classified under the family Chromulinaceæ of the Flagellata. The thallus, which is from 2 to 12 inches long, is adnate, gelatinous, more or less firm, variously divided, and sticky; the cells are at first globose or subglobose, afterward elongated or elliptic, and arranged more or less regularly in longitudinal families; propagation is by means of agile gonidia. In a fresh state some of the species have a very offensive odor.

Hydrus (hī′drus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕδρος, a water-snake: see hydra.] 1. A southern constellation introduced in the eighteenth century. It lies south of Eridanus, Horologium, and Reticulum, and contains three stars of the third magnitude.—2. A genus of venomous sea-snakes, type of a family Hydridæ: now disused, the genus being termed Hydrophis, and the family Hydrophidæ. Schneider, 1799.—3. [l. c.] Some fabulous or undetermined water-snake.

> Cerastes horn'd, hydrus, and elops drear. Milton, P. L., x. 525.

hye[1]†, v. and n. An obsolete form of hie. Chaucer.

hye[2]†, a. An obsolete form of high.

hyemal†, a. An improper form of hiemal.

hyemate†, hyemation†. Obsolete forms of hiemate, hiemation.

hyen†, hyene†, n. [< ME. hyene, < OF. hyene, F. hyène, < L. hyæna: see hyena.] Obsolete forms of hyena.

> The nedith not the galle of no hyene
> That cureth eyen derked for penaunce.
> Chaucer, Fortune, l. 35.

> I will laugh like a hyen, and that when thou art inclined to sleep. Shak., As you Like it, iv. 1.

hyena (hī-ē′nạ), n. [Formerly hyen, hyene, q. v.; = F. hyène = Pr. hiena, yenna, iana = Sp. hiena = Pg. hyena = It. jena = D. hyena = G. hyäne = Dan. hyæne = Sw. hyena, < L. hyæna, < Gr. ὑαινα, a hyena, so called from its bristly mane, like a hog's, < ὗς, a hog (= L. sus = E. sow), + fem. term. -αινα.] 1. A carnivorous quadruped of the genus Hyæna or family Hyænidæ. There are several kinds of hyenas. The common striped or laughing hyena, Canis hyæna or Hyæna striata, known to the ancients as a wild beast of Libya, has long been celebrated for the great size and strength of its neck and jaws, its formidable teeth, its prowling nocturnal habits, its singular voice, and its propensity for robbing graves. It has a wide geographical distribution, including most of Africa and much of Asia, as Syria, Mesopotamia, Persia, and India. It is an unsightly animal of ferocious aspect, of the size of a large dog, with shaggy pelage bristling over the shoulders, a short bushy tail, large eyes and ears, thick blunt muzzle, and peculiar carriage, due to the low hind quarters, high shoulders, and long heavy neck. Its feet are digitigrade, with blunt non-retractile claws. Its color is brownish-gray, more or less distinctly and extensively banded or striped crosswise with black on the back, sides, and limbs. The animal is nocturnal, hiding by day in caves, and hunting by night in packs for its food, which is chiefly carrion, though it often preys upon living animals. It is not less cowardly than ravenous, but is capable of being tamed and even domesticated. The brown hyena, H. brunnea, inhabits southern Africa; it belongs to the same restricted genus as the striped hyena, but is mostly of a dark-brown color, banded only on the limbs, and the pelage is remarkably long and shaggy, growing to a length of 8 or 10 inches on the back and sides. The spotted hyena, H. crocuta or Crocuta maculata, Spotted Hyena (Hyæna crocuta or Crocuta maculata).

ta, is a more distinct species, generically different from either of the foregoing, inhabiting southern parts of Africa. As its name implies, it is spotted instead of striped; and it is rather smaller than H. striata, and has a less shaggy pelage. In this species the length of the neck, size of the head, shortness of the loins, and lowness of the hind quarters are specially notable. The cave-hyena, H. spelæus, is an extinct form closely related to the spotted hyena; its remains occur in caverns. There are also many other fossil representatives of the genus Hyena occurring in the Tertiaries. The hyena-dog is called painted hyena.

> And scorning all the taming arts of man,
> The keen hyena, fellest of the fell.
> Thomson, Summer, l. 921.

2. The pouched dog, the thylacine dasyure of Tasmania, Thylacinus cynocephalus: so called from its predaceous and carnivorous habits. See zebra-wolf.

Also spelled hyæna.

hyena-dog (hī-ē′nạ-dog), n. 1. The aardwolf. See Proteles. W. Swainson.—2. The hunting-dog, or painted hyena, Lycaon pictus, a large spotted wild dog of Africa, resembling a hyena in some superficial respects. It is, however, a true dog, of the subfamily Caninæ. J. E. Gray.

hyenet, n. See hyen.

hyenic (hī-en′ik), a. [< hyena + -ic.] Like a hyena; having the character of a hyena. Also spelled hyænic.

> The Arabs . . . call certain men hyænic, and believe that there is an irresistible affinity between them and the hyæna. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 208.

hyeniform (hī-en′i-fôrm), a. [< NL. hyæniformis, < L. hyæna, a hyena, + forma, form.] Having the character of a hyena or of the Hyænidæ; pertaining to the Hyæniformia. Also spelled hyæniform.

hyenine (hī-ē′nin), a. [< hyena + -ine[1].] Having the character of a hyena; pertaining to or characteristic of the Hyænidæ; hyeniform. Also spelled hyænine.

> The hyenine habit of walking or crawling upon wrist and ankle-joints when fighting or defending itself, with the object of defending its feet from injury. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 435.

hyenoid (hī-ē′noid), a. [< Gr. ὑαινα, hyena, + εἶδος, form.] Hyena-like; hyeniform; hyenine. Also spelled hyænoid.

hyetal (hī′e-tạl), a. [< Gr. ὑετός (= Umbrian savitu), rain, < ὕειν, send rain, ὑει, it rains, = Zend √hu = Skt. √su, express juice (see soma).] Of or relating to rain, or its distribution with reference to different regions, or seasons, or hours; pluvial; rainy.

hyetograph (hī′e-tọ-grạf), n. [< Gr. ὑετός, rain, + γραφειν, write.] A chart showing the average rainfall of the earth or of any of its divisions.

hyetographic (hī″e-tọ-graf′ik), a. [< hyetography + -ic.] Pertaining to hyetography.

hyetographical (hī″e-tọ-graf′i-kạl), a. [< hyetographic + -al.] Same as hyetographic.

> Such [rain-]maps are generally called Hyetographical or Hyetological maps. Huxley, Physiography, p. 46.

hyetography (hī-e-tog′rạ-fi), n. [< Gr. ὑετός, rain, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The art of showing the distribution of rain; that branch of meteorology which ascertains and exhibits in charts, etc., the rainfall of different localities in a given time.

hyetological (hī″e-tọ-loj′i-kạl), a. [< hyetology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to hyetology.

hyetology (hī-e-tol′ọ-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑετός, rain, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of meteorology which treats of the phenomena of rain.

hyetometer (hī-e-tom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑετός, rain, + μέτρον, a measure.] A rain-gage.

hyetometrograph (hī″e-tọ-met′rọ-grạf), n. [< Gr. ὑετός, rain, + μέτρον, a measure, + γράφειν, write.] A rain-gage which automatically registers the amount of rainfall and the time of its occurrence.

> In Hermann's hyetometrograph, 1789, a fixed funnel conducts the rain into one of twelve glasses placed on the circumference of a horizontal wheel, which is turned by clockwork, so that each glass remains under the funnel for one hour. Encyc. Brit., XX. 257.

Hyetornis (hī-e-tôr′nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑετός, rain, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of American cuckoos, of the family Cuculidæ, based upon the rain-bird of Jamaica, H. pluvianus. P. L. Sclater, 1862. Also called Hyetomantis. Cabanis, 1862.

Hygeia (hī-jē′ạ), n. [The usual form given to L. Hygēa or Hygïa, strictly Hygïēa* or, after the Gr. spelling (of the diphthong), Hygieia*, < Gr. Ὑγιεια, the goddess of health, a personification of ὑγιεια, health, soundness of body, < ὑγιής, healthy, sound: cf. Skt. ugra, formidable.] 1. In classical myth., the goddess of health, the chief of the daughters of Æsculapius (Asklepios). She is represented as a maiden, fully draped, and usually holding a patera. She frequently has also the long staff or scepter, another attribute of her father, and is commonly accompanied by the Æsculapian serpent, which may be looked upon as an embodiment of the delegated healing power of Apollo.

2. The 10th planetoid, discovered by De Gasparis, at Naples, in 1849.

Hygeian (hī-jē′an), a. [< Gr. ὑγιεια, health (see Hygeia), + -an.] 1. Relating to Hygeia, the goddess of health.—2. [l. c.] Pertaining to health or to its preservation. Also hygiean.

hygeiolatry (hī-jē-ol'ą-tri), n. [< Gr. ὑγίεια, health, + λατρεία, worship.] The worship of health or of hygiene. [Rare.]

His voice, I think, would have been loudest in the denunciation of that hygeiolatry which threatens to become our only religion. F. P. Cobbe, Contemporary Rev., LI. 804.

hygeist, n. See hygieist.

hygeology (hī-jē-ol'ǫ-ji), n. Same as hygiology.

hyght, a. An obsolete spelling of high.

hyghet, v. and n. An obsolete variant of hie. Chaucer.

hygian, a. See hygeian, 2.

hygieist (hī'jē-ist), n. [< Gr. ὑγίεια, health (see Hygeia), + -ist.] One versed in hygiene or the science of health. Also spelled hygeist.

hygienal (hī-ji-en'al), a. [Formerly hygieinal; < hygiene + -al.] Relating to hygiene or the preservation of health.

Presenting some things relating to the hygieinal part of physic. Boyle, Works, II. 103.

hygiene (hī'ji-ēn), n. [< F. hygiène = Sp. higiene = Pg. hygiena, hygiene = It. igiene = D. G. Sw. hygiene = Dan. hygieine, irreg. < Gr. ὑγιαίνειν, be healthy, sound, < ὑγιής, healthy, sound: see Hygeia.] That department of medical knowledge which concerns the preservation of health; a system of principles or rules designed for the promotion of health; sanitary science.

hygienic (hī-ji-en'ik), a. [< F. hygiénique; as hygiene + -ic.] Relating to hygiene; pertaining to health or the science of health.

How small a proportion of them die before the age of maturity, in the present state of hygienic knowledge. J. S. Mill.

Medication without insuring favorable hygienic conditions is like amputation without ligatures. O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 203.

hygienically (hī-ji-en'i-kal-i), adv. In a hygienic manner; in accordance with the laws of health.

hygienics (hī-ji-en'iks), n. [Pl. of hygienic: see -ics.] The art of maintaining health; hygiene; sanitary science.

So many books have been written on the care of the health, and so much attention has been called to hygienics within a few years. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 66.

hygienism (hī'ji-en-izm), n. [< hygiene + -ism.] Same as hygienics. Imp. Dict.

hygienist (hī'ji-en-ist), n. [< hygiene + -ist.] One who is versed in hygiene.

The business of the hygienist and of the physician is to know the range of these modifiable conditions (such as are capable of being indefinitely modified by our own actions), and how to influence them toward the maintenance of health and the prolongation of life. Huxley, Pop. Sci. Mo., XI. 669.

hygiology (hī-ji-ol'ǫ-ji), n. [Prop. hygieology*, < Gr. ὑγίεια, health, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see Hygeia and -ology.] The art of the preservation of health. Science, VI. 512. Also spelled hygeology.

hygrine (hī'grin), n. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + *-ine*2.] A liquid and volatile alkaloid obtained from coca-leaves. It forms crystallizable salts with acids.

hygro-. [L., etc., hygro-, < Gr. ὑγρό-ς, wet, moist, running, fluid, akin to L. ūvens (for ugvens*), moist, < umere, be moist: see humid, humor, etc.] An element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'wet,' 'moist.'

hygroblepharic (hī-grō-blef'ą-rik), a. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + βλέφαρον, eyelid.] Pertaining to the moisture of, or serving to moisten, the eyelids: applied especially to the ducts of the lacrymal gland which discharge tears.

hygrodeik (hī'grō-dīk), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + δεικνύναι, show.] A form of hygrometer consisting of a wet-bulb and a dry-bulb thermometer (see thermometer and psychrometer) supported one on each side of a frame on which is drawn an appropriate scale. The humidity is indicated by the extremity of an index whose position is determined by the heights of the two mercury-columns.

Hygrogeophila (hī″grō-jē-of'i-lą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + γῆ, the earth, + φίλος, loving.] Same as Gehydrophila.

hygrograph (hī'grō-graf), n. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument which registers automatically the variations in the moisture of the atmosphere.

hygrology (hī-grol'ǫ-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific study of humidity, as that of the atmosphere.

hygroma (hī-grō'mą), n.; pl. hygromata (-ma-tą). [NL., < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + -oma.] In pathol., a swelling with serous contents, such as lymphangiomata, bursæ mucosæ distended with lymph, etc.

hygromatous (hī-grom'ą-tus), a. [< hygroma(t-) + -ous.] Of the nature of or affected with hygroma.

hygrometer (hī-grom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the amount of the moisture of the atmosphere, or more accurately for determining the hygrometric state or relative humidity, which is the ratio between the actual amount of water-vapor present in the air and that required in order to saturate it completely. A common form is the Daniell hygrometer, which consists of a bent glass tube terminating in two bulbs, one covered with muslin, the other of black glass and containing ether and a thermometer. Ether being dropped on the muslin of the upper bulb, the vapor within is condensed, and the consequent evaporation of the ether from the other bulb cools the air about it, and finally to such a degree that moisture is deposited upon its black surface. The dropping is now suspended, and the temperature is taken from the inclosed thermometer; the mean between this temperature and that observed when the moisture disappears is the dew-point. The hygrometric state is the ratio between the pressure of water-vapor corresponding respectively to the dew-point and to the temperature of the air at the time as given by the thermometer on the stand. This form is called a dew-point or condensing hygrometer. Instead of a black glass bulb, a silver vessel is sometimes used, as in Regnault's hygrometer. In the chemical hygrometer a known volume of air is passed over some hygroscopic substance, as calcium chlorid, contained in a drying-tube. This absorbs the aqueous vapor, and by its increase in weight gives the means of calculating the amount present in the unit of volume. The wet bulb thermometer, or psychrometer (see psychrometer), also gives a simple method of obtaining the hygrometric state, by means of appropriately constructed tables.

Daniell Hygrometer.
A, bulb containing ether; B, evaporation bulb covered with muslin.

hygrometric (hī-grō-met'rik), a. [As hygrometer + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to hygrometry; relating to or depending upon the amount of moisture in the atmosphere.

The rate of evaporation is greatly affected by the hygrometric state of the air. Huxley, Physiography, p. 68.

2. Readily absorbing and retaining moisture: as, hygrometric substances or plants.—Hygrometric balance, a popular form of hygroscope designed to afford a rough indication of weather changes.—Hygrometric state. See humidity and hygrometer.

hygrometrical (hī-grō-met'ri-kal), a. [< hygrometric + -al.] Same as hygrometric.

hygrometry (hī-grom'e-tri), n. [As hygrometer + *-y*3.] That branch of physics which relates to the determination of the humidity of gases, especially of the moisture in the atmosphere, embracing also the theory and use of such instruments as have been invented for this purpose.

To get materials for further advance, astronomy requires . . . the direct aid of an advanced optics, of barology, of thermology, of hygrometry. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 186.

hygrophanous (hī-grof'ą-nus), a. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + -φανής, < φαίνειν, show.] In bot., transparent, or like water, when moist, and opaque when dry.

Hygrophila1 (hī-grof'i-lą), n. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1810), fem. sing., < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + φίλος, loving.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the family Acanthaceæ and tribe Ruellieæ, the type of the subtribe Hygrophileæ. It is characterized by a calyx of 5 narrow, nearly equal divisions; a bilabiate corolla; 4 perfect didynamous stamens; entire opposite leaves; and axillary sessile or subsessile flowers. The plants are erect or diffuse herbs. A few of them have infra-axillary spines. About 30 species are known, from the tropical or subtropical parts of the world.

Hygrophila2 (hī-grof'i-lą), n. pl. [NL. (Ferussoc, 1821), neut. pl., < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + φίλος, loving.] A suborder of pulmoniferous gastropods, including the basommatophorous fresh-water family Limnæidæ, etc.

Hygrophileæ (hī-grō-fil'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1832), < *Hygrophila*1 + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants of the family Acanthaceæ, tribe Ruellieæ, typified by the genus Hygrophila, characterized by a 2-lipped corolla, and by having the filaments laterally united in pairs by their bases.

Hygrophorus (hī-grof'ǫ-rus), n. [NL. (E. Fries, 1838), < MGr. ὑγροφόρος, carrying water, < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*1.] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, allied to the agarics, from which they differ in their peculiar habit, and their waxy (not membranaceous) gills and granular intermediate substance. Many of the species are exceedingly brilliant in coloring, which, however, is not a constant character, H. conicus, for example, ranging in color from yellow to scarlet.

hygroplasma (hī-grǫ-plaz'mą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + πλάσμα, anything formed.] In bot., a term proposed by Naegeli for the fluid part of protoplasm. Compare stereoplasma.

hygroscope (hī'grǫ-skōp), n. [< Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument or apparatus in which the hygroscopic property of some substance is employed for indicating approximately the humidity of the air, without attempting its accurate measurement. The most noted hygroscope is that of Saussure (also called the hair hygrometer), in which a prepared human hair, which expands or contracts in length according as the air is more or less moist, is made to move an index over a scale graduated from 0 to 100. By an adjusting-screw the index may be set at 100 whenever the air in the case is known to be saturated, and a fiducial point on the scale is thereby maintained.

Hair Hygroscope of Saussure.
c, the hair supported by the clamp a, adjusted by the screw b, and stretched over the pulley o by the weight p.

hygroscopic (hī-grǫ-skop'ik), a. [< hygroscope + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to the hygroscope; perceptible or capable of being detected only by the hygroscope.—2. Having the property of absorbing moisture from the atmosphere, as hygroscopic tissue, or of becoming coated with a film of moisture.

However dry the air may appear to be, it always contains more or less . . . moisture. Though not recognized by the senses, its presence is readily revealed by the behaviour of certain substances which greedily absorb moisture, and are consequently said to be hygroscopic. Huxley, Physiography, p. 66.

3. In bot., sensitive to moisture; caused by moisture; moving when moistened and then dried, as the elaters of Equisetum or the peristome of mosses.

We may illustrate what we mean by the hygroscopic movements of plants: if the tissues on one side of an organ permit of rapid evaporation, they will dry quickly and contract, causing the part to bend to this side. Darwin, Movement in Plants, p. 489.

hygroscopical (hī-grǫ-skop'i-kal), a. [< hygroscopic + -al.] Same as hygroscopic.

hygroscopicity (hī″grǫ-skǫ-pis'i-ti), n. [< hygroscopic + -ity.] In bot., the character of being hygroscopic; the property possessed by vegetable tissues of absorbing or discharging moisture, and expanding or shrinking accordingly.

hygrostatics (hī-grǫ-stat'iks), n. [< Gr. ὑγρός, moist, + στατικός, causing to stand: see static, statics.] The science or art of expressing or measuring degrees of moisture.

Hygrotrechus (hī-grǫ-trē'kus), n. [NL. (Stål, 1867), < Gr. ὑγρός, wet, moist, + τρέχειν, run.] A genus of water-bugs of the heteropterous family Hydrobatidæ. H. remigis is the most common North American species, of a brown color, frequently seen running over the surface of the water of ponds and streams.

hyke1†, n. Same as huke.

hyke2 (hīk), n. Same as *haik*2.

Hyla (hī'lą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a wood, a forest, woodland, copse, wood cut down, firewood, timber, stuff, material, matter (cf. E. matter, ult. < L. materia), prob. orig. ὕλFη* = L. silva, silua, a wood: see silvan.] A genus of tree-toads of the family Hylidæ, instituted by Laurenti in 1768. The species are numerous. H. versicolor is so called from the chameleon-like color-changes it undergoes. H. pickeringi is a common species of the United States, the shrill piping of which is heard in early spring. H. arborea is a European species.

hylactism (hī-lak′tizm), n. [< Gr. ὑλακτεῖν, bark (< ὑλᾱ́ν, bark), + -ism.] A barking or baying. [Rare.]

There are turkeys, too, . . . and two or three dogs, who bark with a sharp hylactism. Shelley, Letters, p. 54.

Hyladæ (hī′lā-dē), n. pl. See Hylidæ.

hylæosaur (hī′lē-ō-sâr), n. [< Hylæosaurus, q. v.] A gigantic fossil lizard, of the genus Hylæosaurus.

Hylæosaurus (hī″lē-ō-sâ′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑλαῖος, of the wood or forest (< ὕλη, a wood: see Hyla), + σαῦρος, lizard.] A genus of gigantic dinosaurs, established upon remains discovered by Mantell in the Wealden formation of Tilgate Forest in England, and characterized by the development of the dermal scutes into prodigious spines along the middle line of the back. One of these great lizards was probably about 25 feet long.

Hylaplesia (hī-la-plē′si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a wood, + πλησίος, near, close to.] A genus of tropical American frog-like toads, typical of the family Hylaplesiidæ. The species are very prettily or brightly colored; they are such as H. tinctoria, H. picta, and H. speciosa, the latter living in the Andes of the United States of Colombia at a height of 6,000 feet above the sea. Boie, 1827.

Hylaplesiidæ (hī″la-plē-sī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hylaplesia + -idæ.] A family of batrachians, named from the genus Hylaplesia, having the sacral apophyses not flattened, the toes all free and dilated at the ends, perfect ears, and no neck-glands. The few species are confined to tropical America. Also Hylaplesidæ. Synonymous with Dendrobatidæ.

hylde[2]†. A Middle English form of held, preterit of hold[1].

hyleg (hī′leg), n. [Also hileg, hylech: Pers. hailāj, nativity.] In astrol., the giver of life: that is, according to Ptolemy, the sun if in the first, seventh, ninth, tenth, or eleventh house; the moon if situated in one of these divisions when the sun is not there; if neither be there, the degree ascending. Same as apheta.

hylephobia (hī-lē-fō′bi-ą), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -φοβία, fear: cf. hydrophobia.] Morbid fear of materialism; dread of the result of materialistic doctrines. [Rare.]

Hylephobia is now often regarded as a sacred madness, as epilepsy used to be.
G. S. Hall, Amer. Jour. Psychol., Nov., 1887, p. 152.

hylicism (hī′li-sizm), n. Same as hylism.

hylicist (hī′li-sist), n. A materialist; specifically, one of the early Ionic philosophers.

Hylidæ (hī′li-dē), n. pl. [NL.; improp. Hyladæ; < Hyla + -idæ.] A family of arciferous salient amphibians, named from the genus Hyla, having maxillary teeth, dilated sacral diapophyses, and dilated terminal phalanges. The species are commonly called tree-toads or tree-frogs. The limits of the family have varied widely with different writers. The very obvious character of the dilated disk-like ends of the toes is by no means peculiar to the Hylidæ, and has caused various toads and frogs, some even of a different suborder of batrachians, to be erroneously referred to this family. Elimination of all such greatly restricts the family, conformably to the definition here given.

hylism (hī′lizm), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter (see Hyla), + -ism.] In metaph.: (a) Materialism; specifically, the doctrines of the early Ionic philosophers. (b) The theory which regards matter as the principle of evil. Also hylicism.

hyll†. An obsolete spelling of hill.

hylobate (hī′lō-bāt), n. [< Hylobates.] A member of the genus Hylobates or subfamily Hylobatinæ; a long-armed ape or gibbon.

Hylobates (hī-lob′ą-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑλοβάτης, one who haunts the woods, < ὕλη, a wood, forest, + βάτης, one who mounts, < βαίνειν, go.] 1. A genus of anthropoid apes, the gibbons or long-armed apes, typical of the subfamily Hylobatinæ. It usually includes all the gibbons, being thus conterminous with the subfamily, but the siamang is sometimes separated from the rest under the genus Siamanga. There are several true species of Hylobates, such as H. lar. See ape and gibbon. Illiger, 1811.

2. A genus of coleopterous insects. Dejean, 1833.

Hylobatinæ (hī-lob-ą-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hylobates + -inæ.] A subfamily of anthropoid apes, of the family Simiidæ, typified by the genus Hylobates, containing the gibbons. They are characterized by their very slender form with extremely long limbs (especially the arms), and the presence of ischial callosities.

hylobatine (hī-lob′a-tin), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Hylobatinæ, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hylobatinæ.

Hylobius (hī-lō′bi-us), n. [NL. (Germar), < Gr. ὕλη, wood, + βίος, life.] A notable genus of weevils, of the family Curculionidæ. The species live in wood. H. abietis is destructive to firs and other conifers.

Hylocharis (hī-lok′ą-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, wood, forest, + χαίρειν, rejoice.] A genus of humming-birds, based by Boie in 1831 upon one of the sapphirs, Trochilus sapphirinus. The name was subsequently applied by various authors to several different groups of Trochilidæ.

Hylocichla (hī-lō-sik′lą), n. [NL. (Baird, 1864), < Gr. ὕλη, wood, + κίχλη, a bird like the thrush.] A genus of Turdidæ, including the American wood-thrushes. The type is the common wood-thrush, H. mustelina; other abundant and well-known species of the United States are Wilson's thrush or veery, the olive-backed thrush, and the hermit-thrush. See wood-thrush, veery.

Hylodes[1] (hī-lō′dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑλώδης, woody, wooded (of the wood), < ὕλη, wood, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of Australian birds: now called Drymodes. J. Gould, 1841.

Hylodes[2] (hī-lō′dēz), n. [NL., < Hyla + Gr. εἶδος, form.] A genus of toads, of the family Cystignathidæ, containing such species as H. oxyrhynchus of the West Indies. They resemble tree-toads.

hylogenesis (hī-lō-jen′e-sis), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + γένεσις, generation.] The origin of matter.

hylogeny (hī-loj′e-ni), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -γένεια, < -γενής, producing: see -geny.] Same as hylogenesis.

hyloid (hī′loid), a. and n. [< Hyla + -oid.] I. a. Of or relating to the Hylidæ.

II. n. One of the Hylidæ.

hyloidealism (hī″lō-ī-dē′al-izm), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + E. idealism.] The doctrine that reality belongs to the immediate object of belief as such; sensuous subjectivism.

hyloist (hī′lō-ist), n. [Prop. hylist*, < Gr. ὕλη, matter (see Hyla), + -ist.] One who believes matter to be God. Also huloist.

hylology (hī-lol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or theory of matter as unorganized. Krauth.

Hylomys (hī′lō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, wood, + μῦς = E. mouse.] A genus of insectivorous mammals, of the subfamily Gymnurinæ, differing from Gymnura in the shorter tail and smaller third upper premolar. H. suillus is a species formerly wrongly referred to the Tupaiidæ. Müller and Schlegel, 1843.

hylopathic (hī-lō-path′ik), a. [As hylopath-ism + -ic.] Pertaining to hylopathism.

hylopathism (hī-lop′ą-thizm), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + πάθος, feeling, + -ism.] The doctrine that matter is sentient.

hylopathist (hī-lop′ą-thist), n. [As hylopathism + -ist.] A believer in hylopathism.

hylophagous (hī-lof′ą-gus), a. [< Gr. ὑλοφάγος, eating wood, feeding in the woods, < ὕλη, wood, + φαγεῖν, eat.] Eating wood; xylophagous, as certain beetles.

Hylophilus (hī-lof′i-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a wood, + φίλος, loving.] In ornith., a genus of American greenlets, of the family Vireonidæ. It differs from Vireo proper in the stouter feet with larger claws and equal lateral toes, more conical bill with straighter culmen, and other characters. The wings are about as long as the tail, and both are rounded. The genus contains upward of 15 species, all of the warmer parts of continental America; H. sclateri is an example. C. J. Temminck, about 1823.

hylotheism (hī′lō-thē-izm), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + θεός, God, + -ism.] The doctrine or belief that matter is God, or that there is no God except matter and the universe. Also hulotheism.

hylotheist (hī′lō-thē-ist), n. [< hylothe-ism + -ist.] One who believes that matter is God. Also hulotheist.

Hylotoma (hī-lot′ō-mą), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), fem. to Hylotomus.] A genus of sawflies, of the family Tenthredinidæ, or Hylotomidæ. The second and third submarginal cells of the fore wing each receive a recurrent nervure. There are about 25 European and 15 North American species, of rather small size. H. rosæ is the rose saw-fly.

Hylotomidæ (hī-lō-tom′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hylotoma + -idæ.] A family of insects, named from the genus Hylotoma: now usually merged in Tenthredinidæ.

hylotomous (hī-lot′ō-mus), a. [< Gr. ὕλη, wood, + τομός, cutting, < τέμνειν, cut.] Wood-cutting: applied to certain insects which bore into wood.

hylozoic (hī-lō-zō′ik), a. [As hylozo-ism + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of hylozoism.

The numen which the hylozoick corporealist pays all his devotions to is a certain blind shee-god or goddess, called Nature, or the life of matter.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 107.

hylozoical (hī-lō-zō′i-kal), a. [< hylozoic + -al.] Same as hylozoic.

There hath been already mentioned another form of Atheism, called by us hylozoical.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 105.

hylozoism (hī-lō-zō′izm), n. [< Gr. ὕλη, matter, + ζῷον, animal, + -ism.] The doctrine that all matter is endowed with life.

Hylozoism makes all body, as such, and therefore every smallest atom of it, to have life essentially belonging to it.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 105.

When we have attained to this conception of hylozoism, of a living material universe, the mystery of Nature is solved. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 169.

hylozoist (hī-lō-zō′ist), n. [As hylozo-ism + -ist.] A believer in hylozoism; one who holds that matter, and every particle of it, has a species of life or animation.

The hylozoists, by Cudworth's account of them, ascribed a little more to their atoms, imagining them endued with a quality which, though not perception, might be stiled the seed or principle whereout by the junction of many of them together perception might be compleated.
A. Tucker, Light of Nature, II. i. 9.

The hylozoist can attribute consciousness to the falling stone, while Descartes denied it to even the highest brutes.
McK. Cattell, Mind, XIII. 436.

hylozoistic (hī″lō-zō-is′tik), a. [< hylozoist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hylozoism or the hylozoists: as, the hylozoistic conception of the universe.

A Monism that — though essentially based on hylozoistic assumptions — pretends, nevertheless, to explain everything in strict keeping with mechanical principles.
The Open Court, March 17, 1887.

hylozoistically (hī″lō-zō-is′ti-kal-i), adv. After the manner of the hylozoists; in accordance with hylozoistic doctrines.

Hymen[1] (hī′men), n. [L., < Gr. Ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), the god of marriage; origin obscure.] 1. In Gr. myth., the god of marriage, son of Bacchus and Aphrodite (Venus), or of Apollo and one of the Muses, in some legends originally a mortal youth, invoked in hymeneal songs for reasons variously given. Also called Hymenæus.

Here's eight that must take hands
To join in Hymen's bands.
Shak., As you Like it, v. 4.

They light the nuptial torch, and bid invoke Hymen, then first to marriage rites invoked.
Milton, P. L., xi. 591.

Hence — 2. Marriage; the wedded state. [Poetical or archaic.]

We'll have all, sir, that may make your Hymen high and happy. B. Jonson, Epicœne, iii. 2.

To whose bounty
Owe we our thanks for gracing thus our hymen?
Massinger, Renegado, v. 3.

Would this same mock-love, and this Mock-Hymen, were laid up like winter bats, Till all men grew to rate us at our worth.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

hymen[2] (hī′men), n. [< Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a thin skin, a membrane.] A membrane. Specifically —(a) In anat., a fold of mucous membrane stretched across and partly closing the external orifice of the vagina. (b†) In conch., the ligament between the opposite valves of a bivalve shell.

Hymenæa (hī-me-nē′ạ), n. [NL. (so called in allusion to the fact that the leaf is formed of a pair of leaflets), fem. of L. Hymenæus, relating to the god of marriage: see Hymen[1].] A genus of trees of the family Cæsalpiniaceæ and the tribe Amherstieæ. They have leathery leaves, each of 2 leaflets, rather large white flowers in short densely corymbose terminal panicles, and thick oblong or ovate pods. About 8 species are known, all natives of tropical America. H. Courbaril grows to an enormous size, and lives to a very great age, some of the extant individuals being supposed to be older than the Christian era. The heart-wood is very hard and tough, and is hence much valued for wheel-work, particularly for cogs. It is also valuable for posts, rails, and gates. It takes a fine polish, and is so heavy that a cubic foot weighs about 100 pounds. A valuable resin exudes from the trunk. It is known in the West Indies as the locust-tree or varnish-tree, and in Panama as algarroba. Six extinct species of this genus have been described from the Cretaceous of Bohemia, and one from the Miocene of Croatia.

Hymenæa Courbaril.

Hymenaic (hī-me-nā′ik), a. [< LL. Hymenaicus (cf. Gr. Ὑμέναιος), < Gr. Ὑμήν, Hymen: see Hymen[1].] Pertaining to Hymen; used to invoke the god Hymen, as in hymeneal songs or epithalamia.—Hymenaic meter, a dactylic dimeter acatalectic (– ◡ ◡ – ◡ ◡).

Hymenanthera (hī″men-an-thē′rạ), n. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1818), referring to the scales borne by the anthers, < Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + NL. anthera, an anther.] A small genus of rigid shrubs or small trees, of the family Violaceæ and tribe Rinoreeæ. They have small, axillary, frequently polygamous flowers, with the sepals and petals nearly equal, the latter short; anthers almost sessile, united in a tube around the pistil, and bearing on the back an erect scale; placentas of the ovary 2 or rarely 3, each bearing 1 ovule; and the leaves alternate, often clustered. Only 4 species are known, natives of Australia or New Zealand. H. dentata, the scrub-box-wood, is a much-branched shrub often many feet in height. It bears a profusion of very fragrant flowers. The New Zealand species are H. crassifolia and H. Traversii.

Hymenantheræ (hī″men-an-thē′rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Hymenanthera + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural family Violaceæ, containing the single genus Hymenanthera. It is referred by Engler and Prantl to the tribe Rinoreeæ.

hymeneal (hī-me-nē′ạl), a. and n. [As hymenean + -al.] I. a. Pertaining or relating to marriage. Also hymenial.

Chorus hymeneal
Or triumphal chaunt, Matched with thine, would be all
But an empty vaunt.
Shelley, To a Skylark, xiv.

It was pleasant to her to be led to the hymeneal altar by a belted earl. Mrs. Gaskell, Wives and Daughters, I. 236.

=Syn. Connubial, Nuptial, etc. See matrimonial.

II. n. A marriage-song.

For her the spouse prepares the bridal ring,
For her white virgins hymeneals sing.
Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 220.

hymenean (hī-me-nē′ạn), a. and n. [< OF. hymenean, < L. Hymenæus, Hymeneius, < Gr. Ὑμέναιος, belonging to Hymen or marriage: see Hymen[1].] I. a. Pertaining to marriage.

II. n. A marriage-song; an epithalamium.

And heavenly quires the hymenæan sung.
Milton, P. L., iv. 711.

hymenia, n. Plural of hymenium.

hymenial[1] (hī-mē′ni-ạl), a. [< Hymen[1] + -ial; a var. of hymeneal.] Same as hymeneal.

hymenial[2] (hī-mē′ni-ạl), a. [< hymen[2], or hymenium, + -ial.] 1. In anat., pertaining to the hymen.—2. In bot., belonging to the hymenium.—Hymenial alga or gonidium, in lichenology, the algal cells in a sporocarp.—Hymenial gelatin, an amyloid substance in the hymenia of some lichens.—Hymenial layer. Same as hymenium.

hymenic (hī-men′ik), a. [< Hymen[1] + -ic.] Hymeneal.

hymenicolar (hī-me-nik′ọ-lăr), a. [< NL. hymenium, q. v., + L. colere, inhabit.] In bot., inhabiting the hymenium. Cooke.

hymeniferous (hī-me-nif′ẹ-rus), a. [< NL. hymenium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] In bot., provided with a hymenium.

Hymenini (hī-me-nī′nī), n. pl. [NL. (Elias Fries, 1821), < hymenium (which these plants possess) + -ini.] An old order of hymenomycetous fungi, containing 8 genera, such as Agaricus, Hydnum, Polyporus, etc. They are placed by later authorities in the families Agaricaceæ, Polyporaceæ, Hydnaceæ, etc.

hymeniophore (hī-mē′ni-ọ-fōr), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑμένιον, taken in the sense of hymenium, + -φόρος, bearing, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] In bot., the structure or part which bears the hymenium. Sometimes hymenophore, hymenophorum.

hymenitis (hī-me-nī′tis), n. [NL., < hymen[2] + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the hymen.

hymenium (hī-mē′ni-um), n.; pl. hymenia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ὑμένιον, dim. of ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane.] In bot., the fructifying surface in fungi, especially when the spores are naked. It is an aggregation of spore mother-cells, with or without sterile cells, in a continuous stratum or layer upon a sporophore. In the common mushroom, Agaricus, for example, the hymenium or spore-bearing surface is naked or exposed, and spread over the gills, covering them on all sides with a delicate membrane, upon which the reproductive organs are developed. Also called hymenial layer. See cuts under apothecium, ascus, and Fungi.

Hymenodictyon (hī″men-ọ-dik′ti-on), n. [NL. (Wallich, 1824), so called with ref. to the thin reticulated leaves, < Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + δίκτυον, a net.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous trees or shrubs, of the family Rubiaceæ, tribe Cinchoneæ, characterized by having the stigma fusiform, the flowers in branching paniculate spikes, with foliaceous bracts, and opposite, reticulated, long-petioled leaves. About 5 species are known, natives of tropical Asia and Africa. The bark of H. excelsum of India has been used as a substitute for cinchona bark, but it is of little value. The wood is used for making agricultural implements, etc.

Hymenogaster (hī″men-ọ-gas′tėr), n. [NL. (C. Vittadini, 1831), with ref. to the membranous structure of the interior, < Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + γαστήρ, stomach.] A genus of fungi, of the family Hymenogastraceæ. It is characterized by having the peridium thin and villous; the cavities at first empty, radiating or irregular; trama composed of elongated cells; and spores ovate or fusiform. These fungi are globose, fleshy or rather soft, and much like the common puffballs, only smaller.

Hymenogastraceæ (hī″men-ọ-gas-trā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hymenogaster + -aceæ.] A family of fungi, of the division Gasteromycetes, typified by the genus Hymenogaster. They may be regarded as an assemblage of the simpler forms of the Gasteromycetes, possessing usually the simple structure of the type, but including also the genera Gautieria, which is without a peridium, and Rhizopogon, which has a thick, somewhat leathery peridium. Also written Hymenogastrei and Hymenogasterei.

hymenogeny (hī-me-noj′e-ni), n. [< Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + -γένεια, < -γενής, -producing: see -geny.] The production of membrane as the effect of contact of two liquids, as albumen and fat, when the former gives a coating to the globules of the latter.

hymenography (hī-me-nog′rạ-fi), n. [< Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A description of the membranes of animal bodies.

hymenoid (hī′men-oid), a. [< Gr. ὑμενοειδής, membranous, < ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane (see hymen[2]), + εἶδος, form.] Resembling a hymenium in structure; membranous: applied by Léveillé to certain fungi in which the mycelia form a sort of membrane.

hymenolichen (hī″men-ọ-lī′ken), n. [< Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane, + λειχήν, lichen.] A lichen having the character of fructification of the Hymenomycetes.

hymenological (hī″men-ọ-loj′i-kạl), a. [< hymenology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to hymenology.

hymenology (hī-me-nol′ọ-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science or study of the membranes of the animal organism.—2. A treatise on such membranes.

hymenomycetal (hī″men-ọ-mī-sē′tạl), a. Same as hymenomycetous.

hymenomycete (hī″men-ọ-mī′sēt), n. One of the Hymenomycetes.

The sporophore would be thought at first sight to belong to a Peziza rather than to a Hymenomycete.
De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 302.

Hymenomycetes (hī″men-ọ-mī-sē′tēz), n. pl. [NL. (Elias Fries, 1821), < Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane, + μύκης, pl. μύκητες, a mushroom.] An order of fungi, of the group Basidiomycetes, characterized by having a hymenium on the free, exposed surface of the sporophore, the compound structure which bears it. It includes the Agaricaceæ (which are typified by the common mushroom), Polyporaceæ, Hydnaceæ, Thelephoraceæ, Clavariaceæ, and the Hypochnaceæ. Not used by Engler.

hymenomycetoid (hī″men-ọ-mī-sē′toid), a. Same as hymenomycetous.

hymenomycetous (hī″men-ọ-mī-sē′tus), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hymenomycetes. Also hymenomycetal, hymenomycetoid.

Hymenopappeæ (hī″men-ọ-pap′ẹ̄-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Cassini), < Hymenopappus + -eæ.] A former tribe of composite plants, typified by the genus Hymenopappus: now placed in the tribe Heleniceæ.

Hymenopappus (hī″men-ọ-pap′us), n. [NL. (C. L. L'Héritier de Brutelle, 1788), so called from the hyaline pappus, < Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane, + NL. pappus, q. v.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Heleniceæ, the type of the old tribe Hymenopappeæ. The heads are homogamous and discoid, the bracts of the involucre are free, the style-branches are linear and obtuse, and the pappus scales short, obtuse, or nearly equal. They are herbs with radical or alternate pinnisected leaves, and corymbose white or yellow flower-heads. Eight species are known, all natives of North America.

hymeniophore (hī′men-ọ-fōr), n. Same as hymeniophore.

Hymenophoreæ (hī″men-ọ-fō′rẹ̄-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Presl, 1836), as hymenophorum + -eæ.] A division of ferns, not now recognized, including the tribes Aspidiaceæ, Aspleniaceæ, etc.

hymenophorum (hī-me-nof′ọ-rum), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] Same as hymeniophore.

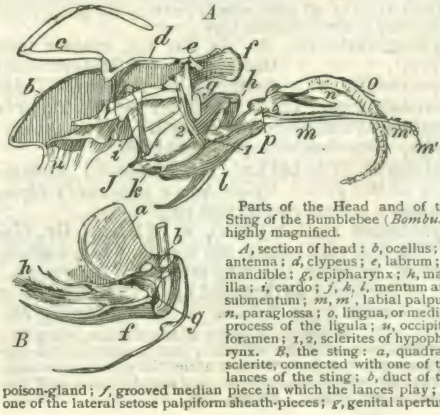
Hymenophyllaceæ (hī″men-ọ-fi-lā′sẹ̄-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Gaudichaud-Beaupré, 1826), so called in allusion to the filmy nature of the frond, < Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A family of homosporous ferns. It is characterized by having the sporangia borne on an elongated, often filiform, receptacle, surrounded by a complete transverse ring opening vertically; sori terminal or marginal from the apex of a vein; indusium inferior, usually of the same texture as the frond; fronda delicately membranous and pellucid. There are only 2 genera, Hymenophyllum and Trichomanes, and about 175 species, mostly confined to the tropics.



hymenophyllaceous (hī″men-ọ-fi-lā′shius), a. Having the appearance or characters of the Hymenophyllaceæ.

Hymenophylleæ (hī″men-ọ-fil′ẹ̄-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1833), < Hymenophyllum + -eæ.] A name originally employed to designate a tribe of ferns, but including the same genera as the Hymenophyllaceæ.

Hymenophyllum (hī″men-ọ-fil′um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane, + φύλλον = L. folium, a leaf.] A genus of usually small and sometimes very minute ferns, including a large number of species with filmy pellucid fronds, found chiefly in hot, damp tropical forests of both hemispheres; the filmy ferns or lace-ferns. It is closely allied to the genus Trichomanes, from which it differs in having the two valves of the involucre separate and not blended into a cup. Two extinct species of this genus have been described from the Carboniferous of Europe, one from the Cretaceous of Kansas, and one from the Laramie group of Colorado. H. Tunbridgense, the Tunbridge fern, is a native of England.

hymenopter (hī-me-nop′tėr), n. A hymenopterous insect; one of the Hymenoptera. Also ★hymenopteran.

Hymenoptera (hī-me-nop′tẹ-rạ), n. pl. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), neuter plural of hymenopterus: see hymenopterous.] A large and important order of the class Insecta. The order is characterized by the 4 membranous wings, of which the hind pair is almost always smaller than the front pair, and has comparatively few nervures. The mouth bears man-

Parts of the Head and of the Sting of the Bumblebee (Bombus), highly magnified.

A, section of head: b, ocellus; c, antenna; d, clypeus; e, labrum; f, mandible; g, epipharynx; h, maxilla; i, cardo; j, k, l, mentum and submentum; m, m′, labial palpus; n, paraglossa; o, lingua, or median process of the ligula; p, occipital foramen; 1, 2, sclerites of hypopharynx. B, the sting: a, quadrate sclerite, connected with one of the lances of the sting; b, duct of the poison-gland; f, grooved median piece in which the lances play; h, one of the lateral setose palpiform sheath-pieces; g, genital aperture.

dibles, and a lower lip or tongue sheathed by the maxillæ. The tarsi are generally 5-jointed, sometimes 4-jointed, rarely 3-jointed, and very seldom heteromerous. The abdomen of the female is provided with a multivalve ovipositor, which may act as a sting, a saw, or a borer. The larvæ are vermiform and footless, except in Phyllophaga and Xylophaga, in which they are caterpillar-like and have feet. The Hymenoptera are usually placed at the head of the class of insects, not only on account of their high structural development, but also with regard to their extraordinary instinctive faculties and social qualities. In modern systems the order is divided into 8 series and 36 families. The series are: (1) Phyllophaga, the saw-flies; (2) Xylophaga, the horntails; (3) Parasitica, with six families, the species of which are mainly parasitic; (4) Tubulifera, or cuckoo-bees; (5) Heterogyna, the four families of ants; (6) Fossores, eleven families of sand- and wood-wasps; (7) Diploptera, with two families of solitary and one of social wasps; and (8) Anthophila, with the two families of bees. In number of species this order stands next to Coleoptera; it probably includes nearly one fourth of all insects. More than 1,000 genera are represented in Europe alone, and there are over 7,000 described European species. Between 6,000 and 7,000 species have been described for America north of Mexico, and yet the extensive group of Parasitica is little known, especially in its smaller forms. —Fossorial Hymenoptera. See fossorial.

hymenopteral (hī-me-nop′tē-ral), a. [< hymenopter-ous + -al.] Same as hymenopterous.

hymenopteran (hī-me-nop′tē-ran), n. [< Hymenoptera + -an.] Same as hymenopter.

hymenopterist (hī-me-nop′tē-rist), n. [< Hymenoptera + -ist.] One who collects or studies the Hymenoptera.

hymenopterologist (hī-me-nop-tē-rol′ō-jist), n. [< hymenopterology + -ist.] One who is versed in the study of Hymenoptera. Lubbock.

hymenopterology (hī-me-nop-tē-rol′ō-ji), n. [< Hymenoptera + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of entomology which relates to Hymenoptera.

hymenopteron (hī-me-nop′tē-ron), n. [NL.: see hymenopterous.] One of the Hymenoptera.

hymenopterous (hī-me-nop′tē-rus), a. [< NL. hymenopterus, < Gr. ὑμενόπτερος, membrane-winged, < ὑμήν, membrane, + πτερόν, wing.] Having membranous wings; specifically, having the characters of the Hymenoptera; pertaining to the Hymenoptera. Also hymenopteral.

Hymenothalameæ (hī″men-ō-tha-lā′mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + θάλαμος, chamber.] A division of lichens, now referred to the family Lecideaceæ.

hymenotomy (hī-me-not′ō-mi), n. [< Gr. ὑμήν, a membrane, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] 1. In anat., dissection of the membranes of the animal body; hymenological anatomy.—2. In surg., incision of the hymen, practised in certain cases of imperforation of the vagina, in order to give exit to blood retained and accumulated in the cavity of the uterus. Dunglison.

hymenulum (hī-men′ū-lum), n.; pl. hymenula (-lą). [NL., dim. of Gr. ὑμήν (ὑμεν-), a membrane: see *hymen*², hymenium.] In bot., a shield containing asci. Cooke.

Hymettian (hī-met′i-an), a. [< L. Hymettius, < Hymettus, < Gr. Ὑμηττός, Hymettus: see def.] Of or pertaining to Hymettus, a mountain of Attica in Greece, celebrated for its flowers, honey, and marble; like that of Hymettus. The mountain is covered with heather, the blossoms of which give it, when seen from a distance, a rosy-purple coloring.

A lovely bee . . . absconding himself in Hymettian flowers. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 76.

Hymettian marble, a bluish-gray marble from the quarries of Mount Hymettus. It is an excellent building-stone, and was much used in antiquity, as at the present day.

Hymettic (hī-met′ik), a. [< Hymettus + -ic.] Same as Hymettian.

The censor L. Crassus was much censured about the year 650 on account of his house with six small columns of Hymettic marble.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 188.

hymn (him), n. [< ME. hympne, himpne, usually ympne, impne, < AS. hymen, ymen, pl. ymnas, in ME. mixed with OF. ymne, later hymne = Pr. hymne, ymne = Sp. himno = Pg. hymno = It. inno = D. G. Dan. hymne = Sw. hymn, < LL. hymnus (in eccl. use), < Gr. ὕμνος, a hymn, festive song, or ode in praise of gods or heroes. Origin uncertain; only once in Homer, in the phrase ὕμνος ἀοιδῆς, which may perhaps mean lit. 'a web of song'; cf. ὑφή, a web, ὑφ-αίνειν = AS. wefan, E. weave.] 1. In general, a religious ode, song, or other poem: as, the Homeric hymns; the hymns of Pindar. In Christian literature the term covers a wide range of poems, including those that embody not only adoration, thanksgiving, confession, and supplication to God, but also instruction and exhortation for men.

Noghte anely he hase comforthe in this, bot also in psalmes and ympnes and antyms of Haly Kyrke.
Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 18.

Than thai toke that haly tre [the cross], . . .
And bare it furth so tham omang,
With himpnes and with nobil sang.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 128.

Our solemn hymns to sullen dirges change.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 5.

Ourself have often tried Valkyrian hymns, or into rhythm have dash'd
The passion of the prophetess.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

Specifically—2. A metrical formula of public worship, usually designed to be sung by a company of worshipers. The hymns of the ancient Hebrews are technically called psalms. From the early Christian period many traces of hymns remain, as in the Magnificat, Benedictus, etc., in the New Testament, in such references as 1 Cor. xiv. 15, Eph. v. 19, Jas. v. 13, etc., and in the universally recognized Gloria Patri, Gloria in Excelsis, and Te Deum. The long succession of important Greek and Latin hymnists begins with Ephraem Syrus and Hilary of Poitiers (both of the fourth century) respectively, though several productions of known authorship antedate their time. Most of the great medieval Latin hymns were composed as sequences, the most famous being the Dies Iræ. The Roman Catholic Church possesses a large number of such hymns, mostly in Latin. The Reformation in Germany was distinguished by a remarkable outburst of hymns of every description. English hymnody began in the sixteenth century, but was principally confined to metrical versions of the Psalms until the first publication of Isaac Watts (in 1707) and the hymns of Charles and John Wesley. Since then the production of hymns has been constant and significant in both England and America. Medieval and modern hymns are nearly always divided into equal and similar sections of from three to twelve lines or strophes each, which are called stanzas or verses.

And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives. Mat. xxvi. 30.

Admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. Col. iii. 16.

3. In a narrow sense, an extra-Biblical poem of worship: opposed to psalm. Specially used in connection with the discussions about the propriety of using any musical formulæ in public worship which are not directly derived from the Bible.—Abecedarian hymns. See abecedarian.—Angelic hymn, cherubic hymn, communion hymn, Marseillaise hymn, etc. See the qualifying words.—Evening hymn. Same as even-song, 1.—Seven great hymns, a collective name for the following medieval Latin hymns: Dies Iræ; Hora Novissima; Jesu, dulcis memoria; Stabat Mater; Veni, Creator Spiritus; Veni, Sancte Spiritus; and Vexilla Regis.

hymn (him), v.; pret. and pp. hymned (himd or him′ned), ppr. hymning (him′ing or him′ning). [< hymn, n. Cf. LL. hymnire, sing hymns; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To celebrate or worship in song; address hymns to; salute with song.

As sons of one great Sire, Hymning the Eternal Father.
Milton, P. L., vi. 96.

The mulberry-tree stood centre of the dance;
The mulberry-tree was hymn'd with dulcet airs.
Cowper, Task, vi. 697.

There the wild wood-robin Hymns your solitude.
R. T. Cooke, Trailing Arbutus.

2. To express in a hymn; sing as a hymn: as, "hymned thanks," J. Baillie.

The perpetual poem hymned by wind and surge.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 757.

II. intrans. To sing hymns.

And touch'd their golden harps, and hymning praised God and his works. Milton, P. L., vii. 258.

Around in festive songs the hymning choir
Mix the melodious voice and sounding lyre.
West, tr. of Pindar's Nemean Odes, xi.

hymnal (him′nal), a. and n. [< hymn + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to hymns; of the nature of or suitable for a hymn.

The grave, majestic, hymnal measure swells like the peal of an organ. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 169.

II. n. A hymn-book.

hymnar† (him′när), n. [< ML. hymnare, a hymn-book, < LL. hymnus, a hymn: see hymn. Cf. hymnary.] A hymn-book.

That our Anglo-Saxon brethren were not slow in adopting these beautiful outpourings of the Christian poet we know from one of Ælfric's enactments, requiring each clerk to have, along with other volumes, a hymnar.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 13.

hymnarium (him-nā′ri-um), n. [ML.: see hymnary.] A hymn-book.

But the reader will scarcely agree with his indulgent estimate of Ken's epic and hymnarium.
The Academy, Nov. 3, 1888, p. 281.

hymnary (him′nā-ri), n.; pl. hymnaries (-riz). [< ML. hymnarius (sc. liber), also hymnarium, a hymn-book, < LL. hymnus, a hymn: see hymn.] A hymn-book. [Rare.]

They [the vicars] were required to learn by heart, so as to need no book, their psalter, their Hymnary, and their Anthem-book. Contemporary Rev., LIII. 59.

hymn-book (him′bůk), n. A book of hymns ★for use in public worship.

hymnic (him′nik), a. [< hymn + -ic.] Relating to hymns; of the character of a hymn; lyric.

Where she (faire ladie), tuning her chast layes
Of England's empresse to her hymnicke string,
For your affect, to hear that virgin's praise,
Makes choice of your chast selfe to heare her sing.
Mir. for Mags., p. 773.

hymnish†, adv. [< hymn + *-ish*¹.] In the manner of a hymn.

Sonnets are carroled hymnish
By lads and maydens. Stanihurst, Æneid, ii. 248.

hymnist (him′nist), n. [< hymn + -ist.] A composer of hymns; one skilled in the writing of hymns; a hymnologist.

Our familiar hymnist, Watts.
H. W. Beecher, N. Y. Christian Union, Dec. 20, 1876.

hymnodist (him′nō-dist), n. [< hymnody + -ist.] A hymnist.

hymnody (him′nō-di), n. [< ML. hymnodia, < Gr. ὑμνῳδία, the singing of a hymn, hymning, < ὑμνῳδός, singing hymns, < ὕμνος, a hymn, + ἀείδειν, ᾄδειν, sing: see ode. Cf. psalmody.] 1. The act or art of singing hymns or sacred songs; psalmody.—2. Hymns collectively; the body of hymns belonging to a particular period, country, sect, or author.

hymnographer (him-nog′ra-fėr), n. [< hymnography + *-er*¹.] A hymn-writer.

hymnography (him-nog′ra-fi), n. [< Gr. as if ὑμνογραφία*, < ὑμνογράφος, writing hymns, < ὕμνος, a hymn, + γράφειν, write.] The art or the act of writing hymns.

hymnologist (him-nol′ō-jist), n. [< hymnology + -ist.] 1. A student of hymnology; a connoisseur in the history, classification, criticism, and use of hymns.—2. A hymn-writer.

hymnology (him-nol′ō-ji), n. [< LL. as if hymnologia*, < Gr. ὑμνολογία, < ὑμνολόγος, singing hymns (> LL. hymnologus, a singer of hymns), < ὕμνος, a hymn, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of hymns, treating of their history, classification, criticism, and use. —2†. Hymnody.

That hymnologie which the primitive Church used at the offering of bread and wine for the Eucharist.
J. Mede, Dialogues, p. 56.

hymn-tune (him′tūn), n. A musical setting of a hymn, usually adapted for repetition with the successive verses or stanzas. Certain kinds of hymn-tunes are called chorals.

hymn-writer (him′rī″tėr), n. A writer or composer of hymns; a hymnist.

hympne†, n. An obsolete form of hymn.

hynd¹†, n. An obsolete form of *hind*¹.

hynd²†, a. Same as *hend*².

hyng†. An obsolete preterit of hang. Chaucer.

hyobranchial (hī-ō-brang′ki-ąl), a. [< hyo(id) + branchial.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the branchiæ.

Hyodon (hī′ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑ, the letter upsilon, Υ (in ref. to hyoid), + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Hyodontidæ, having teeth on the hyoid bone, whence the name. H. tergisus is the common mooneye or toothed herring of the United States. Lesueur, 1818. See mooneye. Originally Hiodon.

hyodont (hī′ō-dont), a. and n. [< Hyodon(t-).] I. a. Having teeth on the hyoid bone; specifically, of or pertaining to the Hyodontidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Hyodontidæ.

Hyodontidæ (hī-ō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of malacopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Hyodon; the toothed herrings, or mooneyes. The body is covered with large silvery cycloid scales; the head is naked; the margin of the upper jaw is formed by the intermaxillaries mesially and by the maxillaries laterally, the latter being articulated to the ends of the former; the opercular apparatus is complete; the dorsal fin belongs to the caudal part of the vertebral column; the stomach is horseshoe-shaped, and without a blind sac; the intestine is short, with one pyloric appendage; and the ova fall into the abdominal cavity before exclusion. Three species are found in the Mississippi basin and the Great Lakes of North America; they have a distant resemblance to a clupeoid fish. Originally Hiodontidæ.

hyo-epiglottic (hī″ō-ep-i-glot′ik), a. [< hyo(id) + epiglottic.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the epiglottis.—Hyo-epiglottic ligament, an elastic band connecting the hyoid bone with the epiglottis.

hyo-epiglottidean (hī″ō-ep″i-glo-tid′ē-ąn), a. Same as hyo-epiglottic.

hyoganoid (hī-ō-gan′oid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Hyoganoidei, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hyoganoidei.

hyoganoidean (hī″ō-ga-noi′dē-ąn), a. and n. Same as hyoganoid.

Hyoganoidei (hī″ō-ga-noi′dē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < hyo(id) + NL. Ganoidei, q. v.] A superorder of true fishes, including the most teleosteoid of the ganoid fishes, having the hyoid apparatus and branchiostegal rays like those of the teleosts. It includes the orders Cycloganoidei and Rhomboganoidei, represented in the existing fauna only by the Amiidæ and Lepidosteidæ, but in ancient times having numerous and diversified representatives. Gill.

hyoglossal (hī-ō-glos'al), a. and n. [< hyo(id) + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue, + -al.] I. a. Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the tongue.—Hyoglossal membrane, a fibrous sheet connecting the base of the tongue with the hyoid bone.—Hyoglossal muscle, the hyoglossus.

II. n. Same as hyoglossus.

hyoglossus (hī-ō-glos'us), n.; pl. hyoglossi (-ī). [NL., < hyo(id) + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue.] A muscle of the hyoid bone and the tongue. In man the hyoglossus is a thin, flat, somewhat square muscle, arising from the whole length of the hyoid bone, on each side of its body, and inserted into the side of the tongue between the styloglossus and lingualis. The origin of the muscle from different parts of the hyoid bone, namely, from the body and the lesser and greater cornua, has caused the description of the muscle as three, called basioglossus, ceratoglossus, and chondroglossus. Also called basiceratochondroglossus.

hyoid (hī'oid), a. and n. [= F. hyoïde, < NL. hyoides, < Gr. ὑοειδής, shaped like the letter upsilon, Υ, now commonly printed Υ, υ; ὄστοῦν ὑοειδές, the hyoid bone (also called ὑψιλοειδής, upsilon-shaped, and λαμβδοειδής, lambda-shaped [Λ]: see upsilon, and lambda, lambdoid); < ὑ, the letter upsilon, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Having the form of the Greek letter upsilon, Υ. In biology and embryology it is applied to the bony or hard parts developed in the second postoral visceral arch of the embryo, this being called the hyoid or hyoidean arch or apparatus, as distinguished from preceding mandibular or succeeding branchial parts.—Hyoid bone. Same as hyoid, n.

II. n. The tongue-bone or os linguæ; the hyoidean bone or collection of bones: so called from its shape in man. In man it is embedded in the muscles of the root of the tongue, lying nearly horizontal with its convexity forward, usually about on a level with the lower border of the under jaw, considerably above the Adam's apple; but it is displaced in every act of swallowing. This horseshoe-shaped arch forms the bony basis of the tongue. (See cut under mouth.) No fewer than 10 muscles arise from or are inserted into it; and it is besides suspended from the skull by the stylohyoid ligament, and connected with the larynx by the thyrohyoid membrane and ligament, and with the epiglottis by the hyo-epiglottic ligament. Its comparatively small size and simple structure in man are unusual; in most animals the bone is either relatively larger, or consists of a number of separate bones, indications of which are found in the human species in the several ossific Diagrams of the mandibular (I, shaded) and hyoidean (II, unshaded) arches of a lizard (A), a mammal (B), and an osseous fish (C). I. Mck, Meckel's cartilage; Art, articulare; Qu, quadratum; Mpt, metapterygoid; M, malleus; pg, processus gracilis; Ptg, pterygoid bone. II. Hy, hyoidean cornu; StH, stylohyal; S, stapedius; Stp, stapes; Sstp, supra-stapedial; Hm, hyomandibular bone; Pc, periotic capsule. The arrow is in the first visceral cleft.

centers from which the bone originates. Thus, the body of the human hyoid is the basihyal; the lesser cornua or horns are the ceratohyals, and the greater cornua are the thyrohyals. (See cut under skull.) In a sauropsidan, as a bird, the so-called hyoid bone is the whole skeleton of the tongue, consisting of several parts developed in a branchial arch, as well as hyoidean parts properly so called. These parts are the basihyal, glossohyal, and ceratohyal or epihyal of the hyoidean arch proper; with the urohyal or basibranchial, the epibranchial, and the ceratobranchial, these three belonging to a branchial arch, and the last two of them being commonly known as the thyrohyal or greater cornu of the hyoid bone. The elements of the hyoid bone of an osseous fish are the basihyal, glossohyal, urohyal, epihyal, ceratohyal, and stylohyal.

This development [of the skull] relates to the protection and support of the still more extraordinarily developed hyoideal and laryngeal apparatus [of the howlers].
Owen, Anat., II. 531.

hyoidean (hī-oi'dē-an), a. [< hyoid + -e-an.] Same as hyoid.

hyomandibular (hī″ō-man-dib'ū-lär), a. and n. [< hyo(id) + mandibular.] I. a. Pertaining to the hyoid bone and to the mandible or lower jaw.

The hyoidean arch becomes segmented into two noteworthy portions, the upper of which is known as the hyomandibular portion. Mivart, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 114.

Hyomandibular bone, in fishes, the bone or element of the suspensorium of the lower jaw next to or articulating with the cranium. Also called epitympanic and temporal.

II. n. Same as hyomandibular bone.

hyomental (hī-ō-men'tal), a. [< hyo(id) + mental[2].] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the chin.

★hyoplastral (hī-ō-plas'tral), a. Of or pertaining to the hyoplastron.

hyoplastron (hī-ō-plas'tron), n. [< hyo(id) + plastron.] The second lateral piece of the plastron of a turtle: a name given by Huxley to what others call the hyosternum. See second cut under Chelonia.

Hyopotamidæ (hī″ō-pō-tam'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyopotamus + -idæ.] A family of omnivorous ungulate mammals, represented by the genus Hyopotamus and related to the Suidæ, or swine. Kowalewsky.

Hyopotaminæ (hī-ō-pot-a-mī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyopotamus + -inæ.] The Hyopotamidæ regarded as a subfamily of Anthracotheriidæ, having the four upper premolars resembling the true molars, and with tubercles in transverse series separated by transverse valleys, and the preceding three molars successively more and more differentiated. Besides Hyopotamus, the subfamily contains the genus Bothriodon (Aymard) or Ancodus (Pomel). T. Gill, 1872.

Hyopotamus (hī-ō-pot'a-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑς, a pig, hog (= L. sus = E. sow[2]), + ποταμός, river. Cf. hippopotamus.] A genus of fossil non-ruminant artiodactyl mammals, supposed to have been of aquatic habits and related to swine, whence the name, given by Owen in 1848. The remains occur in the Tertiary strata, Eocene and Miocene, of England and the continent of Europe. The genus has been referred to the Suidæ and to the Anthracotheriidæ, and also made the type of a family Hyopotamidæ.

hyoscapular (hī-ō-skap'ū-lär), a. [< hyo(id) + scapular, q. v.] Pertaining to the hyoid bone and to the scapula; omohyoid.

hyoscine (hī'o-sin), n. [< Hyosc(yamus) + -ine[2].] A crystalline alkaloid, $C_{17}H_{23}NO_4$, obtained from Hyoscyamus niger. It has a midriatic effect as powerful as that of hyoscyamine. Same as scopolamine.

Hyoscyameæ (hī″o-sī-ā'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Hyoscyamus + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Solanaceæ, typified by the genus Hyoscyamus, having the lobes of the corolla plicate or imbricate, the stamens all perfect, and the fruit a capsule.

hyoscyamine (hī-o-sī'a-min), n. [< Hyoscyamus + -ine[2]. Cf. L. hyoscyaminus, < Gr. ὑοσκύαμινος, of henbane.] A crystalline alkaloid ($C_{17}H_{23}NO_3$) obtained from Hyoscyamus niger, or henbane. It is the levorotatory form corresponding to atropin, which is optically inactive. When moist it has a strong alkaline reaction, and a penetrating, narcotic, and stupefying odor like that of nicotine. It neutralizes acids, forming salts, some of which, particularly the sulphate, are used in medicine. The alkaloid is extremely poisonous.—Amorphous hyoscyamine, hyoscine.

Hyoscyamus (hī-o-sī'a-mus), n. [L., < Gr. ὑοσκύαμος, henbane, lit. hog's bean, < ὑς, gen. of ὑς, a hog, + κύαμος, a bean.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the family Solanaceæ, type of the tribe Hyoscyameæ. They have a tubular-campanulate calyx, an infundibuliform corolla with an oblique limb and imbricated unequal lobes, and a capsule opening by a median transverse circumcision, the top falling off like a lid. They are herbs with the leaves sinuate-dentate or incised, and yellowish flowers in usually 1-sided leafy spikes. About 11 species are known, natives of the Mediterranean region and central Asia. H. niger is the henbane or black henbane. See cut under henbane.

Hyoserideæ (hī″ō-se-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyoseris (-id-) + -eæ.] A subtribe of cichoriaceous plants, typified by the genus Hyoseris. They are herbs, having the pappus more or less chaffy, small, with alternate bristles, and the apex of the achenia truncate.

Hyoseris (hī-os'ē-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑς, a hog, + σέρις, succory.] A small genus of composite plants, of the family Cichoriaceæ, the type of the subtribe Hyoserideæ, having the habit and foliage of Taraxacum. The flower-scape is thickened upward and bears a single yellow flower-head. From their near allies they differ in that the achenia are of two kinds in each head, the outer corky and cylindrical, the inner compressed or two-winged. The pappus is biserial, and consists of narrow and unequal scales. Four species are known from the Mediterranean region, one extending into southern Germany. Two fossil species closely related to this genus have been described from the Miocene of Carniola and Bohemia, under the name Hyoserites.

★hyosternal (hī-ō-stėr'nal), a. [< hyo(id) + sternal.] 1. Pertaining to the hyoid bone and the breast-bone; sternohyoid.—2. In herpet., of or pertaining to the hyoplastron: as, a hyosternal scute.

hyosternum (hī-ō-stėr'num), n. [< hyo(id) + sternum.] The second lateral piece of the so-called sternum—that is, of the plastron—of a chelonian; the hyoplastron of Huxley. See second cut under Chelonia.

hyostylic (hī-ō-stī'lik), a. [< hyo(id) + Gr. στῦλος, pillar, style.] Having the lower jaw suspended from the skull by a special suspensorium: the opposite of autostylic.

Most modern researches have also tended to emphasize the distinction between fishes with autostylic and those with hyostylic skulls.
A. S. Woodward, Cat. Fossil Fishes, B. M., I. p. vii. (1889).

hyp, n. and v. See hip[4].

hyp-. See hypo-.

hypacusis (hip-a-kū'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀκουσις, hearing, < ἀκούειν, hear: see acoustic.] In pathol., diminished power of hearing.

hypæsthesia (hip-es-thē'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + αἰσθησις, perception: see esthetic, etc.] In pathol., diminished capacity for sensation; a dulled but not obliterated sensitiveness.

hypæsthesic (hip-es-thē'sik), a. [< hypæsthesia + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hypæsthesia.

hypæthra, n. Plural of hypæthron.

hypæthral, a. See hypethral.

When processions of men and maidens bearing urns and laurel-branches, crowned with ivy or with myrtle, paced along those sandstone roads, chanting pæans and prosodial hymns, toward the glistening porches and hypæthral cells. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 191.

hypæthron (hī-pē'thron), n.; pl. hypæthra (-thrą). [LL. hypæthrum, < Gr. ὑπαίθρον, the uncovered part of a temple, < ὑπό, under, + αἰθήρ, the sky: see ether[1].] In arch., an open court or inclosure; a place or part of a building that is hypethral, or roofless. See hypethral.

The light seems to have been introduced into what may be considered a court, or hypæthron, in front of the cell, which was lighted through its inner wall.
J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 265.

hypalgesia (hip-al-jē'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀλγησις, sense of pain, < ἀλγεῖν, be in pain, < ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., diminished susceptibility to painful impressions; incipient analgesia.

hypalgia (hī-pal'ji-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἄλγος, pain.] Same as hypalgesia.

hypallage (hi-pal'ą-jē), n. [LL., < Gr. ὑπαλλαγή, an interchange, exchange, a figure of speech by which the parts of a proposition seem to be interchanged (metonymy, epidiorthosis, enallage, hypallage), < ὑπαλλάσσειν, exchange, < ὑπό, under, + ἀλλάσσειν, change, > ἀλλαγή, change, exchange: see allagite. Cf. enallage.] In gram. and rhet., a figure which consists in inversion of syntactical relation between two words, each assuming the construction which in accordance with ordinary usage would have been assigned to the other. Thus, in Virgil (Æneid, iii. 61), "dare classibus austros" (to give the winds to the fleets) is substituted for the usual construction "dare classes austris" (to give the fleets to the winds); the dative and accusative—that is, the indirect and direct objects—having been interchanged. Hypallage is a bold departure from the customary mode of expression, and is almost entirely confined to poetry.—Hypallage of the adjective, the transfer of the attribute from that one of two interdependent substantives with which it would usually agree to the other, especially from a substantive in the genitive to that governing it. See enallage.

hypanisognathism (hī-pan-i-sog'nā-thizm), n. [As hypanisognathous + -ism.] In zoöl., that inequality of the teeth of opposite jaws in which the lower are narrower than the upper; one of two types of anisognathism, the other being epanisognathism. Cope.

hypanisognathous (hī-pan-i-sog'nā-thus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀνισος, unequal, uneven, + γνάθος, the jaw.] In zoöl., having the lower teeth narrower than the upper. Cope.

Hypante (hī-pan'tē), n. See Hypapante.

hypanthia, n. Plural of hypanthium.

hypanthial (hī-pan'thi-al), a. [< hypanthium + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a hypanthium: as, a hypanthial receptacle.

hypanthium (hī-pan'thi-um), n.; pl. hypanthia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἄνθος, a flower.] In bot., an enlargement or other development of the torus under the calyx. Gray. This term has been widely, but incorrectly, applied to the fruit of the fig and allied forms, which properly come under syconium or hypanthodium.

hypanthodium (hī-pan-thō'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + NL. anthodium, q. v.] In bot., same as syconium.

hypantrum (hī-pan'trum), n.; pl. hypantra (-trą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπαντρος, cavernous, with caverns underneath, < ὑπό, under, + ἄντρον, a cavern: see antre.] In anat., the recess in the neural arch of a vertebra with which the hyposphene articulates. See hyposphene, and compare zygantrum.

Hypapante (hip-a-pan'tē), n. [LGr. ὑπαπαντή, a later form of ὑπαντή, equiv. to Gr. ὑπάντησις, a coming to meet, < ὑπαντᾶν, go to meet, < ὑπό, under, + ἀντᾶν, come opposite to, < ἀντα, over against, face to face: see ante-, anti-.] In the Gr. Ch., a festival in memory of the meeting of the infant Christ and his mother with Simeon and Anna in the temple: same as the Western Purification or Candlemas. Also Hypante.

hypapophyses, n. Plural of hypapophysis.

hypapophysial (hip-ap-ō-fiz'i-al), a. [< hypapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hypapophysis: as, the hypapophysial arch.

hypapophysis (hip-a-pof'i-sis), n.; pl. hypapophyses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀπόφυσις, a sprout or process: see apophysis.] In anat., a median process or apophysis from the under or ventral side of the centrum of a vertebra: opposed to epapophysis. The anterior portion of the ring of the human atlas is regarded as a hypapophysis by those who hold that its body ankyloses with the axis as the odontoid process of the latter.

Lumbar Vertebra of Hare.

h, hypapophysis; t, very long transverse process; s, spinous process; m, metapophysis; az, prezygapophysis.

hypargyrite (hip-ärʹji-rīt), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀργυρος, silver, + *-ite*2.] A massive variety of miargyrite obtained from Clausthal in the Harz.

hyparterial (hip-är-tēʹri-al), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἀρτηρία, artery.] Lying below the artery, as a bronchial tube.

hypaspist (hi-pasʹpist), n. [< Gr. ὑπασπιστής, a shield-bearer, armor-bearer, < ὑπασπίζειν, serve as shield-bearer, < ὑπό, under, + ἀσπίς, shield.] In Gr. antiq., a shield-bearer or an armor-bearer; an esquire; in the Macedonian army, one of a royal guard of light-armed foot-soldiers, so called from their shields.

hypate (hipʹā-tē), n. [< L. hypate, < Gr. ὑπάτη (sc. χορδή), the highest note as regards length of string, but the lowest note as regards pitch, fem. of ὑπατος, highest, lowest, extreme, superl. equiv. to ὑπέρτατος, superl. of ὑπέρ, over: see hyper-.] In anc. music, the first or lowest tone in the lowest and in the next to the lowest tetrachords of the recognized system of tones, corresponding loosely to the modern B and E.

hypaton (hipʹā-ton), n. [Gr. ὑπατον, neut. of ὑπατος, highest: see hypate.] See tetrachord.

hypaxial (hī-pakʹsi-al), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + L. axis.] In anat., beneath the vertebral axis of the body; situated on the ventral side of or below the bodies of the vertebræ: opposed to epaxial.—Hypaxial muscles, those muscles lying beneath the spinal column, on the ventral aspect of the vertebral centra.

hypemia, n. An erroneous form of hyphemia.

Hypena (hī-pēʹnä), n. [NL. (Schrank, 1802), ★< Gr. ὑπήνη, the hair on the upper lip, mustache, appar. < ὑπό, under, + -ηνη, perhaps = Skt. āna, the part under the nose.] A genus of noctuid moths, characterized by the small, rather prominent head, naked globose eyes, simple antennæ, very long laterally compressed palpi, a projecting scaly tuft on the front, and unarmed legs. It is a large and wide-spread genus, with over 100 species, largely Asiatic and South American. H. proboscidialis is known as the snout-moth, from the prominent palpi. H. humuli is a hop-feeder in the United States. H. scabralis is a common North American species whose larva feeds on grass and clover.

Hypena scabralis, natural size.

Hypenidæ (hī-penʹi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypena + -idæ.] A family of moths, typified by the genus Hypena, of the group Noctuina. They have broad wings, the anterior ones often bearing tufts of elevated scales, the anterior legs not tufted, palpi long and ascending, and antennæ in the male generally ciliate or pubescent. It is an extensive group, of about 16 genera.

hyper1 (hīʹpėr), n. [Abbr. of hypercritic.] A hypercritic. [Humorous and rare.]

> Criticks I read on other Men,
> And hypers upon them again.
> Prior, Ep. to F. Shepherd, May 14, 1689.

hyper2 (hīʹpėr), v. i. [Origin obscure.] To move about actively; bustle. [Local, U. S.]

> Hyper: to bustle. "I must hyper about an' git tea."
> Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., Int.

hyperabelian (hīʺpėr-ā-belʹi-an), a. [< hyper- + *Abelian*2.] In math., similar to an Abelian integral, function, or group, but more complicated.—Hyperabelian function, a function of two variables connected with a discontinuous group of substitutions of one of the following forms:

hyperacanthosis (hī-pėr-ak-an-thōʹsis), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἄκανθα, spine, + -osis.] Hypertrophy of the stratum spinosum of the epidermis.

hyperacidity (hīʺpėr-a-sidʹi-ti), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. acidity, q. v.] Excessive acidity.

hyperactivity (hīʺpėr-ak-tivʹi-ti), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. activity, q. v.] Over-activity; excessive energy.

> Organs which are in a state of hyperactivity easily become diseased. Medical News, LII. 608.

hyperacuity (hīʺpėr-a-kūʹi-ti), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. acuity, q. v.] Morbid acuteness.

> A case of alleged hypnotic hyperacuity of vision.
> Mind, XII. 154.

hyperacusis (hīʺpėr-a-kūʹsis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀκουσις, hearing, < ἀκούειν, hear: see acoustic.] In pathol., excessive acuteness of the sense of hearing.

hyperacuteness (hīʺpėr-a-kūtʹnes), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. acuteness, q. v.] Excessive acuteness.

> Subtlety and hyperacuteness were the bane of Scholasticism, and, by disgusting all serious minds, greatly contributed towards its overthrow.
> F. Winterton, Mind, XIII. 389.

hyperadenosis (hī-pėr-ad-e-nōʹsis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀδήν (ἀδεν-), a gland, + -osis.] In pathol., the enlargement of lymphatic glands, as in Hodgkin's disease.

hyperæmia, hyperæmic. See hyperemia, etc.

hyperæolian, hyperæolic (hī-pėr-ē-ōʹli-an, -olʹik). See under mode.

hyperæsthesia (hīʺpėr-es-thēʹsi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + αἴσθησις, the faculty of sensation: see æsthesia.] In pathol., excessive sensibility; exalted sensation. Also hyperesthesia, hyperæsthesis, hyperesthesis.

> To such a degree has this hyperæsthesia been observed that patients have been known to scream violently when the skin has been only touched.
> F. B. Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain and Mind, xx.

hyperæsthetic, a. See hyperesthetic.

hyperalgesia (hīʺpėr-al-jēʹsi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀλγησις, sense of pain, < ἀλγεῖν, feel pain.] In pathol., an abnormally great sensitiveness to pain.

hyperalgesic (hīʺpėr-al-jēʹsik), a. [< hyperalgesia + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hyperalgesia.

hyperalgia (hī-pėr-alʹji-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἄλγος, pain.] Hyperalgesia.

hyperaphic (hī-pėr-afʹik), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἁφή, touch, < ἅπτειν, touch.] In pathol., having excessive sensitiveness to touch. Thomas, Med. Dict.

hyperapophyses, n. Plural of hyperapophysis.

hyperapophysial (hī-pėr-ap-ō-fizʹi-al), a. [< hyperapophysis + -al.] In anat., pertaining to or having the character of a hyperapophysis.

hyperapophysis (hīʺpėr-a-pofʹi-sis), n.; pl. hyperapophyses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἀπόφυσις, a process: see apophysis.] A backwardly projecting process of the neural spine of a vertebra.

> It is possible, however, for a neural spine to send back a pair of processes (hyperapophyses), as in Galago, etc., embracing the neural spine next below.
> Mivart, Elem. Anat., p. 45.

hyperaspist (hī-pėr-asʹpist), n. [< Gr. ὑπεραστής, one who holds a shield over, a protector, < ὑπεραστίζειν, cover with a shield, < ὑπέρ, over, + ἀσπίς, a shield. Cf. hypaspist.] In Gr. antiq., one who protected another engaged in fighting by holding a shield over him; hence, a protector or defender.

> I appeal to any indifferent reader, whether C. M. be not by his hyperaspist forsaken in the plain field.
> Chillingworth, Works (ed. 1704), p. 26.

> Such an opinion, if it should meet with peevish opposites on the one side, and confident hyperaspists on the other, might possibly make a sect.
> Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 326.

hyperbata, n. Plural of hyperbaton.

hyperbatic (hī-pėr-batʹik), a. [< Gr. ὑπερβατικός, delighting in hyperbata, < ὑπέρβατον, hyperbaton: see hyperbaton.] Pertaining to or of the nature of the figure hyperbaton; transposed; inverted.

hyperbatically (hī-pėr-batʹi-kal-i), adv. By the figure hyperbaton; by transposition or inversion.

hyperbaton (hī-pėrʹbā-ton), n.; pl. hyperbata (-tä). [L., < Gr. ὑπερβατός, transposed, verbal adj. of ὑπερβαίνειν, step over, < ὑπέρ, over, + βαινειν, go.] In gram. and rhet.: (a) A figure consisting in departure from the customary order by placing a word or phrase in an unusual position in a sentence; transposition or inversion, especially of a bold or violent sort. Hyperbaton is principally used for emphasis: as, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians" (Acts xix. 28), for "Diana of the Ephesians is great." It also frequently serves to facilitate clearness of connection between clauses. In ancient Greek and Latin literature it was in constant use to produce a rhythmical effect in sentences by arranging words on metrical rather than syntactical principles. It is most frequently used in poetry, being one of the principal means of differentiating poetic diction from that of prose; but it is by no means rare in oratory in passages of an especially earnest or passionate character, and it is very common in excited or vehement conversation. Also called trajection. See synchysis. (b) An instance or example of such trans★position.

hyperbola (hī-pėrʹbō-lä), n. [= F. hyperbole = Sp. hipérbola = Pg. hyperbole = It. iperbola, < NL. hyperbola, < Gr. ὑπερβολή, the conic section hyperbola (so called by Apollonius because the side of the rectangle on the abscissa equal to the square of the ordinate overlaps the latus rectum) (see ellipse), lit. excess (see hyperbole), < ὑπερβάλλειν, throw over, exceed, < ὑπέρ, over, + βάλλειν, throw.] 1. A curve formed by the intersection of a plane with a double cone—that is, with two similar cones placed apex to apex, so that one is the continuation of the other. If the plane cuts only one of the cones, the section is a circle, an ellipse, or a parabola; but if both cones are cut, the section is a hyperbola. A hyperbola may be formed by throwing upon a table the shadow of a ball the top of which is higher than the source of light. It has two asymptotes. If through any point of the curve lines be drawn parallel to the asymptotes, the parallelogram so formed will be of constant area for any given hyperbola. The point of intersection of the asymptotes is the center of the hyperbola, and is equidistant from the two intersections of any line through it with the hyperbola. The two lines through the center bisecting the angles of the asymptotes are the lines of the axes of the hyperbola, and the curve is symmetrical with respect to each of these. One of these lines cuts the curve, and the points of intersection are called the vertices of the hyperbola. The line between the vertices is the transverse axis of the hyperbola. If from the vertices lines be drawn parallel to the two asymptotes, the two points at which these lines will meet will be the extremities of the conjugate axis. The equation of the hyperbola, referred to its center and axes, is Hyperbola.

DBE, GAH, are opposite branches of a hyperbola; F, f, foci; C, center; AB, transverse axis; ab, conjugate axis; NCP, a diameter.

$$\frac{x^2}{a^2} - \frac{y^2}{b^2} = 1.$$

The foci of the hyperbola are two points on the line of the transverse axis distant from the center as far as the vertices are from the extremities of the conjugate axis. If from any point of the curve lines be drawn to the two foci, the difference of the lengths of these lines is constant for any given hyperbola, and the angle between them is bisected by the tangent at that point. The eccentricity of the hyperbola is the secant of half the angle between the asymptotes. The parameter or latus rectum of a hyperbola is a chord through the focus perpendicular to the transverse axis.

2. An algebraic curve having asymptotes greater in number by one than its order. This meaning was introduced by Newton.—Acute hyperbola, a hyperbola which lies in the acute angle between its asymptotes.—Ambigenal, anguineal, etc., hyperbola. See the adjectives.—Circumscribed hyperbola, a hyperbola that crosses both asymptotes.—Common or conic hyperbola, a hyperbola proper, defined under def. 1, above.—Conjugate hyperbolas, two hyperbolas having common asymptotes, the transverse axis of either being the conjugate axis of the other.—Cubical hyperbola. See cubical.—Deficient or defective hyperbola. See deficient.—Equilateral hyperbola, a hyperbola whose asymptotes are at right angles to one another, and whose axes are consequently equal.—Focal hyperbola. See focal.—Infinite hyperbola, a hyperbola in the Newtonian sense. See def. 2, above.—Inscribed hyperbola, a hyperbola which does not cross its asymptotes.—Logarithmic hyperbola, the section of a right cylinder having a hyperbola as its base by a paraboloid. This name was given by Booth in 1851.—Nodated hyperbola. See nodated.—Obtuse hyperbola, a hyperbola which lies in the obtuse angle between its asymptotes.—Pitch hyperbola, a hyperbola the inverse squares of whose diameters are proportional to the pitch of the parallel generators of the cylindroid whose generators are the possible screws of a rigid body having two degrees of freedom.

hyperbolæon (hī″pėr-bō-lē′on), n. See tetrachord.

hyperbole (hī-pėr′bō-lē), n. [= F. hyperbole = Sp. hipérbole = Pg. hyperbole = It. iperbole, < L. hyperbole, < Gr. ὑπερβολή, excess, overstrained phrase, etc.: see hyperbola, the same word with accom. L. termination.] In rhet., an obvious exaggeration; an extravagant statement or assertion not intended to be understood literally.

When we speake in the superlatiue and beyond the limites of credit, that is by the figure which the Greeks call Hiperbole. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 159.

Three-pil'd hyperboles, spruce affectation, Figures pedantical. Shak., L. L. L., v. 2.

No city brings better home to us than Ragusa the Eastern hyperbole of cities great and fenced up to heaven. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 226.

★=Syn. See exaggeration.

hyperbolic (hī-pėr-bol′ik), a. [= F. hyperbolique = Sp. hiperbólico = Pg. hyperbolico = It. iperbolico, < L. hyperbolicus, < Gr. ὑπερβολικός, extravagant, < ὑπερβολή, hyperbole: see hyperbole. In mod. use the adj. goes also with hyperbola.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of hyperbole; obviously exaggerating or exaggerated.

Among the Zulus the hyperbolic compliment to the king, "Thou who art as high as the mountains," passes from the form of simile into the form of metaphor when he is addressed as "You Mountain." H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 401.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of the hyperbola.—3. Having a pair of real points at infinity. Thus, hyperbolic space is so called because in it every right line has two real points at infinity; so hyperbolic transformation, substitution, etc.—Hyperbolic amplitude of any quantity. See amplitude.—Hyperbolic arc, an arc of the hyperbola.—Hyperbolic conoid. See conoid[1], 1 (a).—Hyperbolic curvature, function, geometry, etc. See the nouns.—Hyperbolic cylindroid, a solid generated by the rotation of a hyperbola about its conjugate axis. Sir C. Wren.—Hyperbolic leg or branch of a curve, a leg or branch having an asymptote or asymptotes.—Hyperbolic logarithm, a natural logarithm, or one whose base is 2.7182818. See logarithm.—Hyperbolic singularity of a function, an essential singularity: so called because such singularities of a theta Fuchsian function are connected with hyperbolic substitutions of the fundamental Fuchsian group.—Hyperbolic space, a space in which the sum of the three angles of a triangle would be less than two right angles.—Hyperbolic spiral, a spiral curve the law of which is that the distance from the pole to the generatrix varies inversely as the distance swept over.

hyperbolical (hī-pėr-bol′i-kal), a. [< hyperbolic + -al.] 1. Same as hyperbolic, 1.

You shout me forth
In acclamations hyperbolical,
As if I loved my little should be dieted
In praises sauced with lies. Shak., Cor., i. 9.

The shewes in our Lady street being so hyperbolical in pomp that day that it exceeded the rest by many degrees. Coryat, Crudities, I. 38.

I have a hyperbolical tongue; it catches fire as it goes. George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 243.

2. Same as hyperbolic, 2. [Rare.]

hyperbolically (hī-pėr-bol′i-kal-i), adv. 1. In a hyperbolic manner; with obvious exaggeration; in a manner to express more or less than the truth.

Scylla is . . . hyperbolically described by Homer as inaccessible. Broome.

Created natures allow of swelling hyperboles; nothing can be said hyperbolically of God. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 2.

2. In the form of a hyperbola.

hyperboliform (hī-pėr-bol′i-fôrm), a. [= F. hyperboliforme; as hyperbola + -form.] Having the form of a hyperbola of a higher kind.

hyperbolise, v. See hyperbolize.

hyperbolism[1] (hī-pėr′bō-lizm), n. [< hyperbola + -ism.] In geom., a curve the equation of which is derived from that of another curve by writing xy for y.

hyperbolism[2] (hī-pėr′bō-lizm), n. [= F. hyperbolisme; as hyperbole + -ism.] The use of hyperbole; the character of being hyperbolical.

The hyperbolisms of the oriental style. Horsley, Works, I. v.

hyperbolist (hī-pėr′bō-list), n. [= Pg. hyperbolista; as hyperbole + -ist.] One who uses hyperbole.

hyperbolize (hī-pėr′bō-līz), v.; pret. and pp. hyperbolized, ppr. hyperbolizing. [= F. hyperboliser = Sp. hiperbolizar; as hyperbole + -ize.] I. intrans. To use hyperbole; speak or write with obvious exaggeration.

The Spanish traveller . . . was so habituated to hyperbolize . . . and relate wonders that he became ridiculous. Howell, Forreine Travell, xiv.

II. trans. To exaggerate; represent or speak of in a hyperbolical manner.

Vain people hyperbolizing his fact, . . . he grew by their flattery into that madness of conceit. Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 203.

Also spelled hyperbolise.

hyperbolograph (hī-pėr-bol′ō-grâf), n. [< Gr. ὑπερβολή, hyperbola, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument for the description or drawing of hyperbolas.

hyperboloid (hī-pėr′bō-loid), n. [< Gr. ὑπερβολή, hyperbola, + εἶδος, form.] 1. A quadric surface having a center not at infinity, and some of its plane sections hyperbolas. There are two kinds of hyperboloid, those of one and of two sheets. The hyperboloid of one sheet has a real intersection with every plane in space; that of two sheets has only imaginary intersections with some planes. In either case all the plane sections perpendicular to one of the axes are ellipses, and those perpendicular to either of the others are hyperbolas.

2. A hyperbola of a higher order.

hyperboloidal (hī-pėr-bō-loi′dal), a. [< hyperboloid + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a hyperboloid.

The crests of the teeth of a skew-bevel wheel are parallel to the generating straight line of the hyperboloidal pitch-surface. W. J. M. Rankine, Encyc. Brit., XV. 759.

hyperborean (hī-pėr-bō′rē-an), a. and n. [= F. hyperboréen, < LL. Hyperboreanus, < L. hyperboreus, adj. (> It. iperboreo = Pg. hyperboreo = Sp. hiperbóreo = F. hyperborée), Hyperborei, n. pl., < Gr. ὑπερβόρεος, ὑπερβόρειος, adj., beyond the north wind, Ὑπερβόρεοι, n. pl., the Hyperboreans, an imaginary people in the extreme north, < ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + βορέας, the north wind (perhaps orig. the 'mountain' wind, Ὑπερβόρεοι, the people 'beyond the (Rhipæan) mountains'): see hyper-, Boreas, and oread.] I. a. 1. Situated in or inhabiting the far north: as, the hyperborean regions; a hyperborean race; the hyperborean phalarope.

From hyperborean skies,
Embodied dark, what clouds of Vandals rise!
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 85.

Hence—2. Very cold; frigid.

The more chilly and pinching hyperborean atmosphere in which they have grown up and been formed. Craik, Hist. Eng. Lit., I. 6.

3. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the imaginary race of Hyperboreans.—4. Arctic.

The first, or Hyperborean group (of the Native Races of the Pacific States), comprises the tribes of Alaska and a part of British America, and includes races perfectly distinct from one another. N. A. Rev., CXX. 37.

II. n. [cap.] 1. An inhabitant of the most northern region of the earth. In early Greek legend the Hyperboreans were a people who lived beyond the north wind, and were not exposed to its blasts, but enjoyed a land of perpetual sunshine and abundant fruits. They were free from disease, violence, and war. Their natural life lasted 1,000 years, and was spent in the worship of Apollo. In later times the Greeks gave the name to the inhabitants of northern countries generally.

2. pl. In ethnol., the tribes of the arctic.

hyperbrachycephalic (hī-pėr-brak″i-se-fal′ik or hī-pėr-brak-i-sef′a-lik), a. [As hyperbrachycephal-y + -ic.] Extremely brachycephalic; exhibiting hyperbrachycephaly.

hyperbrachycephaly (hī-pėr-brak-i-sef′a-li), n. [< hyper- + brachycephaly.] In craniom., extreme brachycephaly; the character of a skull of which the cranial index is over 85. See craniometry.

hyperbranchial (hī-pėr-brang′ki-al), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + βράγχια, gills.] Situated over the gills or branchiæ: as, the hyperbranchial groove of the pharynx of a lancelet.

hyper-Calvinist (hī-pėr-kal′vin-ist), n. See Calvinist.

hypercardia (hī-pėr-kär′di-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + καρδία, heart.] In pathol., hypertrophy of the heart. Dunglison.

hypercatalectic (hī-pėr-kat-a-lek′tik), a. [< L. hypercatalecticus, equiv. to hypercatalectus, < Gr. ὑπερκατάληκτος, < ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + καταλῆκτός, stopping off: see catalectic.] In pros., having an additional syllable or half-foot (thesis or arsis) after the last complete dipody: as, a hypercatalectic colon or verse. The epithet hypercatalectic, like brachycatalectic, is applicable to those meters only which are scanned by dipodies—that is, to iambic, trochaic, anapestic, and occasionally and exceptionally to dactylic meters.

hypercatalexis (hī-pėr-kat-a-lek′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + κατάληξις, an ending, termination, catalexis: see catalexis.] In pros., excess of a final syllable or half-foot after the last measure in a series or line measured by dipodies. In classical poetry hypercatalexis is found as the apparent excess of an arsis (metrically unaccented part of a foot) at the end of one colon or series, the arsis at the beginning of the next being wanting; so that, if such an arsis be reckoned to the second colon, all the measures would be complete: thus, ⏑ – ⏑ – | ⏑ – ⏑ – | ⏑ ‖ – ⏑ – | ⏑ – ⏑ –.

hypercatharsis (hī″pėr-ka-thär′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερκάθαρσις, excessive purging, < ὑπερκαθαίρεσθαι, be purged excessively, < ὑπέρ, over, + καθαίρειν, cleanse, purge, > κάθαρσις, a purging: see catharsis, cathartic.] In med., an excessive purging; action of the bowels excited by a violent cathartic.

hypercathartic (hī″pėr-ka-thär′tik), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + καθαρτικός, purging (see cathartic), after hypercatharsis.] I. a. Pertaining to or of the nature of hypercatharsis.

II. n. A medicine which produces excessive purging.

hyperchloric (hī-pėr-klō′rik), a. [< hyper- + chloric.] Same as perchloric.

hyperchromasia (hī″pėr-krō-mā′si-ä), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + χρῶμα, color.] A pathological condition marked by excess of pigment.

hyperchromatism (hī-pėr-krō′ma-tizm), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + χρῶμα(τ-), color, + -ism.] A state of unusually heightened or intensified coloration, as that of melanism or erythrism, in an animal.

hypercinesia, hypercinesis, etc. See hyperkinesis, etc.

hypercomplex (hī-pėr-kom′pleks), a. [< hyper- + complex.] Composed of a number of imaginaries or complex quantities. Thus, a quantity $ai + bj +$, etc., where a, b, etc., are complex scalars, while i, j, etc., are peculiar units, having their proper multiplication-table, is a hypercomplex quantity.

hyperconic (hī-pėr-kon′ik), a. [< hyper- + conic.] In math., relating to the intersection of two surfaces of the second order.

hypercoracoid (hī-pėr-kor′a-koid), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + E. coracoid.] The upper of the two bones of typical fishes interposed between the actinosts or fin-bearing elements and the proscapula or principal bone of the scapular arch. Called by Cuvier radial, by Owen ulna, and by later naturalists scapula. See cut under scapulo-coracoid.

hypercritic (hī-pėr-krit′ik), n. [= F. hypercritique = It. ipercritico; as hyper- + critic.] One who is critical beyond measure or reason; an over-rigid critic; a captious censor.

hypercritical (hī-pėr-krit′i-kal), a. [< hyper- + critical. Cf. hypercritic.] 1. Excessively or captiously critical; judging adversely from trivial or irrelevant considerations; unduly finical or unjustly severe in judgment.

Such hypercritical readers will consider my business was to make a body of refined sayings, only taking care to produce them in the most natural manner. Swift.

I take the official oath to-day with no mental reservations, and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypercritical rules. A. Lincoln, First Inaugural Address.

2. Excessively exacting or scrupulous. [Rare.]

We are yet far from imposing . . . these nice and hypercritical punctilios, which some astrologers . . . oblige our Gard'ners to. Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, Int.

hypercritically (hī-pėr-krit′i-kal-i), adv. In a hypercritical manner; with excessive criticism.

We cannot afford to speak contemptuously of any sort of knowledge, and God forbid that we should speak contemptuously or hypercritically of any honest worker. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 13.

hypercriticise, v. t. See hypercriticize.

hypercriticism (hī-pėr-krit′i-sizm), n. [< hyper- + criticism.] Excessively minute or severe criticism.

To insist on points like these is mere hypercriticism. Scotsman (newspaper).

hypercriticize, hypercriticise (hī-pėr-krit′i-sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypercriticized, hypercriticised, ppr. hypercriticizing, hypercriti- cising. [< hyper- + criticize, criticise.] To criticize with excessive severity; criticize captiously.

hypercycle (hī'pėr-sī-kl), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + κύκλος, circle.] A plane curve of the sixth order and fourth class having the line at infinity as a double tangent, which possesses the property that two pairs of tangents to it may be so taken that, whatever fifth tangent be considered, the two circles inscribed or escribed in the two triangles formed each with one of the pairs of fixed tangents and the variable tangent have their points of contact with the latter at a constant distance. It is necessary that these circles and tangents be described in definite directions, in order to choose properly between the inscribed and escribed circles.

hyperdeterminant (hī″pėr-dē-tėr′mi-nant), a. and n. [< hyper- + determinant.] I. a. In math., invariantive.

II. n. In math., an invariant. This word, originally used by Cayley from 1845 to 1852, is now replaced by invariant.

hyperdiapason (hī-pėr-dī-ą-pā′zon), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διαπασῶν, diapason: see diapason.] In anc. music, the interval of the octave when measured upward; a superoctave.

hyperdiapente (hī-pėr-dī-ą-pen′tē), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διὰπεντε, diapente: see diapente.] In anc. music, the interval of a perfect fifth when measured upward.

hyperdiatessaron (hī-pėr-dī-ą-tes′ą-ron), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διατεσσάρων, diatessaron: see diatessaron.] In anc. music, the interval of a perfect fourth when measured upward.

hyperdiazeuxis (hī-pėr-dī-ą-zūk′sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + διάζευξις, diazeuxis: see diazeuxis.] In anc. music, the separation of two tetrachords by the interval of an octave, as between the hypaton and the hyperbolæon. See tetrachord.

hyperdistributive (hī″pėr-dis-trib′ṳ̄-tiv), a. and n. [< hyper- + distributive.] I. a. Having the distributive property as extended to several variables simultaneously. Thus, if the function, operation, or symbol, F, is said to be hyperdistributive.

$$F(x, y) + F(\xi, \eta) = F(x + \xi, y + \eta),$$

II. n. A hyperdistributive function.

hyperditonos (hī-pėr-dit′ō̤-nos), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + δίτονον, the major third: see ditone.] In anc. music, the interval of a major third when measured upward.

hyperdorian (hī-pėr-dō′ri-ąn), a. [< hyper- + Dorian.] See under mode.

hyperdoric (hī-pėr-dor′ik), a. [< hyper- + Doric.] See under mode.

hyperdulia (hī″pėr-dū-lī′ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, beyond, + δουλεία, service: see dulia.] The worship offered by Roman Catholics to the Virgin Mary: so called because it is higher than that given to other saints, which is known as dulia, while the worship due to God alone is called latria. See dulia. Also hyperduly.

hyperdulical (hī-pėr-dū′li-kąl), a. [< hyperdulia + -ic-al.] Of the nature of hyperdulia.

hyperduly (hī′pėr-dū-li), n. [< F. hyperdulie, < NL. hyperdulia, q. v.] Same as hyperdulia.

hyperdynamic (hī″pėr-dī-nam′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπερδύναμος, of higher power, < ὑπέρ, over, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] In pathol., characterized by excessive violence or excitement, as the vital powers in some kinds or states of disease.

hyperelliptic (hī″pėr-e-lip′tik), a. [< hyper- + elliptic, q. v.] Transcending what is elliptic.—Hyperelliptic curve, a curve whose Cartesian coördinates are expressible rationally by a parameter, λ, and the square root of an entire function, $Q\lambda$, of degree $2p + 2$, where p is the class of the curve.—Hyperelliptic function, a function arising from the conversion of hyperelliptic integrals in the same manner in which elliptic functions arise from the conversion of elliptic integrals.—Hyperelliptic integral, the integral of the square root of an integral function higher than the fourth degree.

hyperemesis (hī-pėr-em′e-sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἔμεσις, vomiting: see emesis[1].] In pathol., excessive vomiting.

hyperemetic (hī″pėr-ē-met′ik), a. [< hyperemesis, after emetic, q. v.] Pertaining to or affected with hyperemesis.

hyperemia, hyperæmia (hī-pėr-ē′mi-ą), n. [NL. hyperæmia, < Gr. as if ὑπεραιμία* (cf. ὑπεραιμοῦν, have overmuch blood), < ὑπέρ, over, + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., an excessive accumulation of blood in any part of the body.—Active or arterial hyperemia, excess of blood due to dilatation of the arterioles, the velocity of the current being increased.—Passive or venous hyperemia, excess of blood due to obstruction of the outflow through the veins, the velocity of the current being diminished.

hyperemic, hyperæmic (hī-pėr-ē′mik), a. [< hyperemia, hyperæmia, + -ic.] In pathol., affected with hyperemia.

hyperesthesia, n. See hyperæsthesia.

hyperesthesic (hī″pėr-es-thē′sik), a. [< hyperesthesia + -ic.] Same as hyperesthetic.

Hyperæsthesic states. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 339.

hyperesthesis (hī″pėr-es-thē′sis), n. Same as hyperæsthesia.

hyperesthetic, hyperæsthetic (hī″pėr-es-thet′-ik), a. [< hyperæsthesis, after esthetic, q. v.] Morbidly sensitive; affected with hyperæsthesia. Also hyperesthesic.

The disorder [neuralgic dysmenorrhea] . . . is generally associated with a highly susceptible nervous temperament, which may be defined as the hyperæsthetic temperament. R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 195.

A sleepy, phlegmatic creature will get up from bed in half the time it takes your hyperæsthetic patient to find himself among all the confusion of worries he has drawn around him, and to shake himself free from them. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 923.

hyperfuchsian (hī-pėr-fōk′si-ąn, a. [< hyper- + Fuchsian.] In math., resulting from an extension of the properties of the Fuchsian group or function.—Hyperfuchsian function, a function of two variables with a four-dimensional fundamental sphere as its natural limit, and connected with the discontinuous group of substitutions hypergenesis (hī-pėr-jen′e-sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + γένεσις, generation.] Excessive production.

Hyperfuchsian group. See group[1].

hypergenetic (hī″pėr-jē-net′ik), a. [< hypergenesis, after genetic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hypergenesis.

hypergeometric (hī-pėr-jē-ō̤-met′rik), a. [< hyper- + geometric.] Resulting from an extension of the properties of the geometric series.—Hypergeometric function, the function expressed by a hypergeometric series, or by the equation

$$\phi x - d^n y/dx^n + \sum_{0}^{n-1} k (-1)^{n-k} \{(\lambda - k - 1)_{n-k}\, \phi^{n-k} x + (\lambda - k - 1)_{n-k-1}\, \psi^{n-k-1} x\}\, d^k y/dx^k = 0,$$

where ϕx and ψx are integral functions of the nth and $(n-1)$th degrees respectively, and λ is a constant.—Hypergeometric series. Same as Gaussian series (which see, under Gaussian).

hypergeusia (hī-pėr-gū′si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + γεῦσις, the sense of taste, < γεύειν, taste.] Hyperæsthesia of the sense of taste.

hyperhexapod (hī-pėr-hek′są-pod), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἑξάπους, six-footed.] I. a. Having more than six legs, as an arthropod; pertaining to the Hyperhexapoda, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Hyperhexapoda.

Hyperhexapoda (hī″pėr-hek-sap′ō̤-dą), n. pl. [NL.: see hyperhexapod.] Arthropods with more than three pairs of legs; the crustaceans, arachnidans, and myriapods.

hyperhidrosis, hyperidrosis (hī″pėr-hi-drō′sis, -i-drō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἱδρωσις, perspiration: see hidrosis.] In pathol., excessive sweating.

Hyperia (hī-pē′ri-ą), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Hyperiidæ.

Hypericaceæ (hī″pėr-i-kā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Hypericum + -aceæ.] A family of plants, of which the genus Hypericum is the type. It contains 14 genera and 380 species. They are herbs, shrubs, or (rarely) trees, with simple, opposite (rarely whorled) leaves, which are often dotted with resinous glands. They have terminal or axillary, solitary, cymose or paniculate flowers, usually yellow or white, with 5 sepals and usually 5 petals, and the numerous stamens usually united into 3 or 5 bundles at their base. Also called Hypericineæ, Hypericeæ, Hypericinæ.

Hypericeæ (hī-pē-ris′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypericum + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Hypericaceæ, containing the genera Hypericum and Ascyrum. They are characterized by having the capsule septicidal, seeds not winged, and smooth petals.

Hypericum (hī-pe-rī′kum, usually hī-per′i-kum), n. [L., also hypericon, < Gr. ὑπέρεικον (also ὑπέρικον), neut., ὑπέρεικος, fem., St.-John's-wort, < ὑπό, under, + ἐρείκη, also ἐρίκη, L. erīce, heath, heather: see Erica.] 1. A large genus of plants, the type of the family Hypericaceæ, containing about 200 species, very generally distributed over the earth, characterized by having pentamerous flowers with the stamens commonly clustered into 3 to 5 parcels. They are herbs or shrubs with cymose yellow flowers. H. perforatum, or St.-John's-wort, is a small species, which derives its specific name from the fact that the pellucid dots common to the leaves of most of the species are in it peculiarly conspicuous, so as to give the leaf the appearance of being perforated. It is a native of Europe, now extensively naturalized in the United States. H. Ascyron, the great St.-John's-wort of the eastern United States, is a tall shrubby plant with pods an inch or more long. H. Kalmianum, Kalm's St.-John's-wort, is a bushy shrub 1 to 6 feet high, growing along the northern lakes. H. densiflorum occurs in pine-barrens from New Jersey southward. H. mutilum, the dwarf St.-John's-wort, only 3 to 9 inches high, is common in low grounds everywhere in the eastern United States. H. Androsæmum, the tutsan or tutsan hypericum, is a somewhat woody species of southern Europe and central Asia. From its succulent capsule, which turns red and then black, it is placed by some in a separate genus. It was once considered a panacea. H. quadrangulum of Europe is the St.-Peter's-wort or hard-hay. H. aureum is a handsome species of the southern United States.

Branch of Hypericum aureum, with flower and young fruit.
a, cluster of stamens; b, fruit.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Hypericum all bloom, so thick a swarm
Of flow'rs, like flies clothing her slender rods,
That scarce a leaf appears. Cowper, Task, vi. 165.

hyperideation (hī-pėr-ī-dē-ā′shon), n. [< hyper- + ideation.] Excessive mental activity; restlessness of mind.

hyperidrosis, n. See hyperhidrosis.

Hyperiidæ (hī-pe-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyperia + -idæ.] A family of amphipod crustaceans, typified by the genus Hyperia. They have a large subglobular head, large lateral eyes, straight antennæ, palps to mandibles, the last five pairs of perelopods ambulatorial, and the seventh pair not transformed. Representatives occur in almost all seas. Also Hyperina.

Hyperiidea (hī″pėr-ī-id′ē-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Hyperia + -idea.] A tribe or superfamily of amphipod crustaceans, having a free head, large lateral eyes, maxillipeds coalesced into a kind of operculum, uropods natatorial, and telson undivided. It contains many families, of which the most important is the Hyperiidæ.

hyperinosis (hī″pėr-i-nō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ἰς (iv-), strength, fiber, + -osis.] In pathol., a condition of the blood in which it forms on clotting an unusual amount of fibrin: opposed to hypinosis.

hyperinotic (hī″pėr-i-not′ik), a. [< NL. hyperinosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hyperinosis.

hyperionian (hī″pėr-ī-ō′ni-ąn), a. [< hyper- + Ionian.] See under mode.

hyperionic (hī″ pėr-ī-on′ik), a. [< hyper- + Ionic.] Same as hyperionian.

hyperite (hī′pe-rīt), n. [Short for hypersthenite.] A name given at various times and by various writers to rocks of very uncertain and indeterminate character. Some of the rocks designated as hyperite belong with diabase, and others with diorite. Some writers have used hyperite as the equivalent of hypersthenite. The latest use of it, and that adopted by Rosenbusch, is by Törnebohm, who designates under the name of hyperite a rock intermediate in character between normal gabbro and olivin gabbro. Also called hypersthene gabbro.

hyperjacobian (hī″pėr-ja-kō′bi-ąn), a. [< hyper- + Jacobian.] In math., derived from a complication of the idea of a Jacobian surface or curve. If $U = 0$ is a surface of degree n, and $\phi = 0$, $\psi = 0$, etc., are surfaces of the same degree m, generally different from n, if $D_X U = u$, $D_Y U = v$, $D_Z U = w$, $D_T U = k$, $D_X \phi = a$, $D_Y \phi = b$, $D_Z \phi = c$, $D_T \phi = d$, $D_X \psi = a'$, $D_Y \psi = b'$, etc., and if Δ, Δ', etc., be symbols of any higher derivatives, let the following matrix be formed:

$$\begin{matrix} u, & v, & w, & k, & \Delta U, & \Delta' U, & \dots \\ a, & b, & c, & d, & \Delta\phi, & \Delta'\phi, & \dots \\ a', & b', & c', & d', & \Delta\psi, & \Delta'\psi, & \dots \end{matrix}$$

This matrix must have one more column than it has rows. From this two independent determinants may be formed; and these being equated to zero give the equations to the hyperjacobian surfaces of the system, while their intersection is the hyperjacobian curve.

hyperkinesis, hypercinesis (hī″pėr-ki-nē′sis, -si-nē′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + κίνησις, movement, < κινεῖν, move.] In pathol., abnormal amount of muscular action; spasmodic action; spasm. Also hyperkinesia, hypercinesia.

hyperkinetic, hypercinetic (hī″pėr-ki-net′ik, -si-net′ik), a. [< hyperkinesis, after kinetic.] Relating to or characterized by hyperkinesis.

hyperlydian (hī-pėr-lid'i-an), a. [< hyper- + Lydian.] See under mode.

hypermedication (hī-pėr-med-i-kā'shon), n. [< hyper- + medication.] In med., the excessive use of drugs.

hypermetamorphic (hī-pėr-met-a-môr'fik), a. [< hyper- + metamorphic.] Characterized by or exhibiting hypermetamorphism; undergoing repeated transformations.

hypermetamorphism (hī-pėr-met-a-môr'fizm), n. [< hyper- + metamorphism.] In entom., the character of being subject to hypermetamorphosis; the process of undergoing complete transformation. Hypermetamorphism is a type of development found in beetles of the families Meloidæ, Rhipiphoridæ, and Stylopidæ, in which an active larva-stage is followed by one or two inactive stages (the last called the pseudo-pupa) before the true pupa-state is attained. Many of the insects characterized by hypermetamorphism are parasitical in or on the bodies of Hymenoptera during at least a part of their lives. Some insects pass through no fewer than six recognizable stages after hatching from the egg and before reaching maturity. In the case of the blister-beetles or meloids these stages have been severally named, from the resemblance the larvæ bear to those of certain other insects, as, 1st, triungulin; 2d, caraboid; 3d and 4th, scarabæoid; 5th, coarctate; 6th, scolytoid.

Hypermetamorphism is a term applied to certain conditions in which the larva at one period of its life assumes a very different form and habit from those of another period. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 147.

hypermetamorphosis (hī-pėr-met-a-môr'fō-sis), n. [NL., < hyper- + metamorphosis.] In entom., complete metamorphosis; radical transformation; change from one form to a very different one. See hypermetamorphism.

Certain beetles . . . undergo what has been called a hyper-metamorphosis — that is, they pass through an early stage wholly different from the ordinary grub-like larva. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 363.

hypermetamorphotic (hī-pėr-met″a-môr-fot'ik), a. [< hypermetamorphosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Same as hypermetamorphic. [Rare.]

The extraordinary genus Sitaris (equally hypermetamorphotic), a parasite in bees' nests. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 149.

hypermetaphorical (hī-pėr-met-a-for'i-kal), a. [< hyper- + metaphorical.] Excessively metaphorical.

Entangled, hypermetaphorical style. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 203.

hypermeter (hī-pėr'me-tėr), n. [< LL. hypermeter (Diomedes, Marius Victorinus), < Gr. ὑπέρμετρος, going beyond the meter, beyond measure, < ὑπέρ, beyond, + μέτρον, meter, measure.] 1. In pros.: (a) A verse or period having one more syllable at the end than properly belongs to the meter which it represents; especially, a heroic hexameter with an additional syllable in the last foot, usually intended to be elided by synaphea before a vowel beginning the next line; a dolichurus. (b) A period consisting of more than two or three cola; a hypermetron. (c) A line or meter with one syllable beyond the last complete foot or measure. The word is not infrequently found in this sense in books on English versification; but it is a departure from the original nomenclature of prosody.
2. Anything greater than the ordinary standard of measure. [Rare.]

When a man rises beyond six foot, he is an hypermeter, and may be admitted into the tall club. Addison, The Tall Club.

hypermetra, n. Plural of hypermetron.

hypermetric (hī-pėr-met'rik), a. [As hypermeter + -ic.] In pros.: (a) Exceeding the correct measure; having a syllable at the end in excess of the meter represented; especially, dolichuric: as, a hypermetric verse or line. (b) Of more than usual length; more than dicolic or tricolic: as, a hypermetric period. See hypermeter, hypermetron.

hypermetrical (hī-pėr-met'ri-kal), a. [< hypermetric + -al.] Same as hypermetric.

hypermetron (hī-pėr'me-tron), n.; pl. hypermetra (-trą). [< Gr. ὑπέρμετρον, neut. of ὑπέρμετρος, beyond the meter: see hypermeter.] In anc. pros., a period exceeding the usual extent of a meter; a period longer than the ordinary line or verse.

hypermetrope (hī-pėr-met'rōp), n. [< hypermetropia, without the suffix.] A person affected with hypermetropia.

When the hypermetrope wishes to examine anything close to him, an undue amount of convergence will direct the axis of vision to a point nearer than the object looked ★at. New York Med. Jour., XL. 719.

hypermetropia (hī″pėr-me-trō'pi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + μέτρον, measure, + ὤψ (ὠπ-), eye.] A natural or acquired condition of the eyes in which the focus (that is, of parallel rays when the accommodation is completely relaxed) falls behind the retina; long-sightedness: the opposite of myopia. Also hyperopia, hypermetropy, and hyperpresbyopia.—Absolute hypermetropia, hypermetropia in which parallel rays cannot be brought to a focus on the retina by an exertion of the eye. —Facultative hypermetropia, hypermetropia in which parallel rays can be focused on the retina without converging the visual lines.—Latent hypermetropia, that hypermetropia which is not detected by finding the strongest convex lens with which the patient can focus parallel rays on the retina, but which, being due to involuntary accommodation, may reveal itself after the use of convex glasses for a while, or the instillation of atropin.—Manifest hypermetropia, that hypermetropia which is determined by finding the strongest convex lens with which the patient can focus parallel rays on the retina.—Relative hypermetropia, hypermetropia in which parallel rays can be focused on the retina only by converging the visual lines.

hypermetropic (hī″pėr-me-trop'ik), a. [< hypermetropia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with hypermetropia; far-sighted.

When . . . the hypermetropic eye loses its power of adjustment with age, then even distant objects can not be seen distinctly. Such persons, therefore, while young, should habitually wear slightly convex glasses, which make their eyes normal. Le Conte, Sight, p. 52.

hypermetropy (hī-pėr-met'rō-pi), n. [< NL. hypermetropia.] Same as hypermetropia.

hypermixolydian (hī-pėr-mik-sō-lid'i-an), a. [< hyper- + mixolydian.] See under mode.

hypermnesia (hī-pėrm-nē'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + μνήσις, remembrance.] Unusual power of recollection.

The phenomena, whether of amnesia or hypermnesia, which mesmerists allege, reach no such marvellous pitch as this. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 288.

hypermyriorama (hī-pėr-mir″i-ō-rä'mą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, beyond, + μυρίος, countless, myriad, + ὅραμα, a view, < ὁρᾶν, see. Cf. panorama.] An exhibition consisting of innumerable views. Imp. Dict.

hypernic (hī'pėr-nik), n. [A trade-name, < hyper- + Nic(aragua wood), or nic(ric), itself < Nic(aragua wood).] Among American dyers, Nicaragua wood, or any other red wood or redwood extract of the same class. J. W. Slater.

hyperoa, n. Plural of hyperoön.

Hyperoartia (hī″pėr-ō-är'ti-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερῷος, being above, upper (see hyperoön), + ἄρτιος, complete, perfect, < ἄρτι, just, exactly.] A primary subdivision of myzonts, marsipobranchiates, or Cyclostomata, including forms with the roof of the mouth or palate entire or imperforate, the single nasal duct not penetrating it. Various values have been assigned to it. By J. Müller it was regarded as an order; by Günther it was ranked as a suborder; and by E. R. Lankester it was raised to the rank of a class of vertebrates. Its only living representatives belong to the family of Petromyzontidæ or lampreys.

hyperoartian (hī″pėr-ō-är'ti-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hyperoartia.

II. n. One of the Hyperoartia.

Hyperoödon (hī-pėr-ō'ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερῷος, being above, upper, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of whales of the family Physeteridæ and subfamily Ziphiinæ; the typical bottle-nosed whales. They have a globular head, rising abruptly from a small distinct snout, whence the name bottlenose. The vertebræ number 45; the cervical vertebræ are ankylosed; and there is a small concealed tooth at the end of each mandibular ramus. The details of cranial structure are characteristic, in relation with the peculiar shape of the head. H. rostratus and H. latifrons inhabit the northern Atlantic, attaining a length of from 20 to 30 feet; the former is the common bottlenose. The genus was founded by Lacépède in 1803. Anarnacus is a synonym.

hyperoön (hī-pėr-ō'on), n.; pl. hyperoa (-ą). [< Gr. ὑπερῷον, an upper story or room, neut. of ὑπερῷος, being above, upper, < ὑπέρ, above: see hyper-.] In Gr. antiq., an upper story in a building; particularly, a gallery over a side aisle in a temple.

hyperopia (hī-pėr-ō'pi-ą), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὤψ (ὠπ-), eye.] Same as hypermetropia.

hyperopic (hī-pėr-op'ik), a. [< hyperopia + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hypermetropia.

The glass, however, which will correct the simple hypermetropia or myopia will not answer for the hyperopic or myopic astigmatism. New York Med. Jour., XL. 720.

hyperopsia (hī-pėr-op'si-ą), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὄψις, view: see optic.] Extremely acute vision.

hyperorexia (hī″pėr-ō-rek'si-ą), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὄρεξις, a longing: see orexis.] In pathol., excessive desire for food; inordinate appetite; bulimia.

hyperorthodox (hī-pėr-ôr'thō-doks), a. [< hyper- + orthodox.] Extremely orthodox.

hyperorthodoxy (hī-pėr-ôr'thō-dok-si), n. [< hyper- + orthodoxy.] Extreme orthodoxy.

hyperorthognathic (hī-pėr-ôr-thog-nath'ik), a. [< hyperorthognathy + -ic.] Exceedingly orthognathic; exhibiting hyperorthognathy.

hyperorthognathy (hī″pėr-ôr-thog'nā-thi), n. [< hyper- + orthognathy.] In craniom., excessive orthognathy, as when the cranial index is 91 or over.

hyperosmia (hī-pėr-os'mi-ą), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὀσμή, ὀδμή, a smell, odor: see osmium.] In pathol., excessive sensitiveness to odors.

hyperostosis (hī″pėr-os-tō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + ὀστέον, bone, + -osis.] 1. A morbid outgrowth of bone from a bone.—2. An overgrowth of bone; a normal (not morbid) exostosis or increase of bony tissue.

These bones are rough with a hyperostosis of their surfaces. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 319.

Hyperotreta (hī″pėr-ō-trē'tą), n. pl. [NL., said to be < Gr. ὑπερῷη, the palate, + τρητός, perforated, verbal adjective of τετραίνειν, perforate.] A primary subdivision of myzonts, embracing forms with the roof of the mouth perforated by the single nasal canal. It has been variously ranked as an order by J. Müller, as a suborder by Günther, and as a class of vertebrates by E. R. Lankester. Its few living representatives have been combined in one family, Myxinidæ, by some ichthyologists, and by others have been segregated into two, Myxinidæ and Eptatretidæ or Heptatremidæ. Also called Hyperotreti.

hyperotretan (hī″pėr-ō-trē'tan), a. and n. [< Hyperotreta + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hyperotreta. Also hyperotrete, hyperotretous.

II. n. One of the Hyperotreta.

hyperotrete (hī'pėr-ō-trēt), a. and n. Same as hyperotretan.

hyperotretous (hī″pėr-ō-trē'tus), a. [< Hyperotreta + -ous.] Same as hyperotretan.

hyperoxidation (hī-pėr-ok-si-dā'shon), n. [< hyper- + oxidation.] Excessive oxidation.

hyperoxygenated (hī-pėr-ok'si-jen-ā-ted), a. [< hyper- + oxygenated.] Supersaturated with oxygen.

hyperoxygenation (hī-pėr-ok″si-je-nā'shon), n. [< hyper- + oxygenation.] The process or state of being hyperoxygenated.

hyperoxygenized (hī-pėr-ok'si-jen-īzd), a. [< hyper- + oxygenized.] Same as hyperoxygenated.

hyperparasite (hī-pėr-par'a-sīt), n. [< hyper- + parasite.] A hyperparasitic insect, or one which exhibits hyperparasitism.

hyperparasitic (hī-pėr-par-a-sit'ik), a. [< hyper- + parasitic.] Parasitic upon a parasite; characterized by or exhibiting hyperparasitism, as many insects.

Various parasitic and hyper-parasitic groups [of ants]. Nature, XXXIV. 16.

hyperparasitism (hī-pėr-par'a-sīt-izm), n. [< hyper- + parasitism.] In entom., the parasitism of certain Ichneumonidæ, Chalcididæ, etc., which in the larval state live in the bodies of other insect parasites.

hyperpharyngeal (hī″pėr-fa-rin'jē-al), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φάρυγξ, throat (pharynx): see pharynx, pharyngeal.] Situated over or above the pharynx.

The hyperpharyngeal groove of Amphioxus. Micros. Science, XXVII. 350.

hyperphasia (hī-pėr-fā'zi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φάσις, speaking, < φάναι, say, speak.] In pathol., lack of control of the organs of speech.

hyperphasic (hī-pėr-fā'zik), a. [< hyperphasia + -ic.] Affected with hyperphasia.

hyperphenomenal (hī″pėr-fē-nom'e-nal), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φαινόμενα, phenomena: see phenomenal.] Superior to the phenomenal; noumenal.

About the hyperphenomenal reality of our own existence, the existence of God, and the existence of matter. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 761.

hyperphrygian (hī-pėr-frij'i-an), a. [< hyper- + Phrygian.] See under mode.

hyperphysical (hī-pėr-fiz'i-kal), a. [< hyper- + physical.] Superior to matter; higher than the physical; immaterial.

Vital powers cannot be merely physical, and we must believe in something hyper-physical, something of the nature of a soul. Whewell.

hyperphysics (hī-pėr-fiz'iks), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + φυσικά, physics: see physics. Cf. metaphysics.] The science of that which transcends physics.

Medicine, physics, metaphysics, and hyperphysics.
Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 15.

★hyperplasia (hī-pėr-plā'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + πλάσις, a forming, < πλάσσειν, form, mold.] In pathol., overgrowth of a part due to multiplication of its cells; excessive cell-reproduction. Compare hypertrophy, 1.

Interstitial hyperplasia of the connective tissue.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 659.

hyperplasic (hī-pėr-plas'ik), a. [< hyperplasia + -ic.] Same as hyperplastic.

hyperplastic (hī-pėr-plas'tik), a. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + πλαστός, formed, < πλάσσειν, form. Cf. hyperplasia.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hyperplasia: as, a hyperplastic tonsil.

The cervix was composed of dense, hard, hyperplastic tissue, almost cartilaginous in character.
Medical News, XLIX. 383.

hyperpnœa (hī-pėr-nē'ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + πνοή, breathing, < πνεῖν, breathe.] In pathol., energetic or labored respiration.

hyperpyrexia (hī″pėr-pi-rek'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + πυρέσσειν, be feverish, < πυρετός, a fever: see pyretic.] In pathol., a high degree of pyrexia or fever.

hyperpyrexial (hī″pėr-pi-rek'si-ąl), a. [< hyperpyrexia + -al.] Pertaining to or exhibiting hyperpyrexia.

hyper-resonance (hī-pėr-rez'ō-nans), n. [< hyper- + resonance.] Exaggerated resonance.

hypersarcoma (hī″pėr-sär-kō'mą), n.; pl. hypersarcomata (-ma-tą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπερσάρκωμα, overgrown flesh, < ὑπερσαρκοῦσθαι, have or get an excess of flesh, < ὑπέρ, over, + σάρξ (σαρκ-), flesh. Cf. sarcoma.] In pathol., proud or fungous flesh.

hypersarcosis (hī″pėr-sär-kō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπερσάρκωσις, an overgrowth of flesh, < ὑπερσαρκοῦσθαι, have an excess of flesh: see hypersarcoma.] Same as hypersarcoma.

hypersecretion (hī″pėr-sē-krē'shon), n. [< hyper- + secretion.] Excessive secretion.

Catarrh is essentially a hypersecretion of the epithelium.
Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 378.

hypersensitive (hī-pėr-sen'si-tiv), a. [< hyper- + sensitive.] Excessively sensitive.

There have descended to us numerous persons whose nerves are naturally hypersensitive.
Nineteenth Century, XXII. 659.

hypersensitiveness (hī-pėr-sen'si-tiv-nes), n. [< hypersensitive + -ness.] The state or character of being over-sensitive.

My pictures are likely to remain as private as the utmost hypersensitiveness could desire.
George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxxvii.

hypersensual (hī-pėr-sen'sū-ąl), a. [< hyper- + sensual.] Same as supersensual.

hyperspace (hī'pėr-spās), n. [< hyper- + space.] A space of more than three dimensions.

The notion of the quasi-geometrical representation of conditions by means of loci in hyperspace is employed by Salmon.
Cayley, On Curves which Satisfy Given Conditions (1867).

hyperspherical (hī-pėr-sfer'i-kąl), a. [< hyper- + spherical.] Originating from an extension of the conception of spherical harmonics.—Hyperspherical function of the first kind, the function $P_n(l, x)$ when $\Sigma a^n P_n(l, x)$ is the development by powers of a of $1/(a^2-2ax+1)^l$.—Hyperspherical function of the second kind, a function, $Q_n(l, x)$, related to the hyperspherical function of the first kind as Q is related to P in ordinary spherical functions.

hyperstene (hī'pėr-stēn), n. An erroneous form of hypersthene.

hypersthene (hī'pėr-sthēn), n. [So named from its difficult frangibility as compared with hornblende, with which it was formerly confounded; < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + σθένος, strength.] A mineral related to pyroxene, but orthorhombic in crystallization. It is a silicate of iron and magnesium. It was early called Labrador hornblende. Its color is between grayish and greenish black, but often with a peculiar copper-red luster or shimmer on the cleavage-surface, due to the presence of minute inclusions. It is usually found foliated and massive.—Hypersthene andesite. See andesite.—Hypersthene gabbro. Same as hyperite.—Hypersthene rock. Same as hypersthenite.

hypersthenia (hī-pėr-sthē'ni-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + σθένος, strength.] In pathol., a condition characterized by extreme excitement of all the vital phenomena.

hypersthenic[1] (hī-pėr-sthen'ik), a. [< hypersthenia + -ic.] In pathol., relating to, characterized by, or producing over-excitement; stimulating: stimulated.

hypersthenic[2] (hī-pėr-sthen'ik), a. [< hypersthene + -ic.] Containing hypersthene; resembling hypersthene.

hypersthenite (hī-pėr-sthē'nīt), n. [< hypersthene + -ite[2].] A name given by G. Rose (1835) to a crystalline aggregate of labradorite and hypersthene, for which the name norite is now preferred. It is a rock closely allied to gabbro. Also called hypersthene rock.

hyperthesis (hī-pėr'the-sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρθεσις, a passing over, a transposition (also excess, the superlative degree), < ὑπερτιθέναι, put over, set over, put off (in mid. exceed), < ὑπέρ, over, + τιθέναι, set, put, > θέσις, a putting down: see thesis.] 1. In anc. pros., interchange of quantity in two successive places of a logaœdic series, so that in one of two lines metrically corresponding, as in strophe and antistrophe, a long is apparently transferred to a position before a short, which it would normally succeed, or a short transferred so as to exchange places with a preceding long. See polyschematic.—2. In philol., a transfer or "attraction" of a letter from the syllable to which it originally belonged to another syllable immediately preceding or following it; orthographic transposition, or metathesis: thus, in Greek, μέλαινα is used for μελανια*.—3. In the Gr. Ch., a fast in addition to those regularly observed.

hyperthetic (hī-pėr-thet'ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπερθετικός, superlative (cf. hyperthesis), < ὑπερτιθέναι, set over: see hyperthesis, and cf. superlative.] Pertaining to, affected by, or exemplifying hyperthesis: as, the hyperthetic form (of a foot or meter); a hyperthetic license.

hyperthetical† (hī-pėr-thet'i-kąl), a. [As hyperthetic + -al.] Superlative.

But herein this case is ruled against such men, that they affirme these hyperthetical or superlative sort of expressions and illustrations are too bold, and bumbasted.
Chapman, Iliad, xv., Comment.

hypertrichosis (hī″pėr-tri-kō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair, + -osis.] An abnormally large development of hair either locally or generally over the body.

hypertridimensional (hī-pėr-trī-di-men'shon-ąl), a. [< hyper- + tridimensional.] In math., having more than three dimensions.

hypertrophic (hī-pėr-trof'ik), a. [< hypertrophy + -ic.] Pertaining to hypertrophy; producing or tending to produce hypertrophy.

hypertrophical (hī-pėr-trof'i-kąl), a. [< hypertrophy + -ic-al.] Of the nature of hypertrophy; hypertrophic.

hypertrophous (hī-pėr'trō-fus), a. [< hypertroph-y + -ous.] Characterized by hypertrophy: as, hypertrophous cirrhosis.

hypertrophy (hī-pėr'trō-fi), n. [< Gr. ὑπέρ, over, + τροφή, nutrition, < τρέφειν, nourish.] 1. In pathol., an enlargement of a part of the body from excessive growth or multiplication of its elements; specifically, an enlargement due to growth of the individual elements, as distinguished from hyperplasia, where there is a multiplication of the cellular elements. Hence —2. Figuratively, excessive growth or accumulation of any kind.

Nights of financial hypertrophy.
The Century, XXVI. 419.

Language is not swift enough to give expression to his [the hasheesh-eater's] rapid thoughts. There is, as it were, an hypertrophy of ideas. What in the normal state would cause very trifling discomfort, now (from the effects of hasheesh) becomes an unbearable evil, and the patient cries and begs for commiseration.
Pop. Sci. Mo., Aug., 1878, p. 483.

3. In bot., a general term for all cases of excessive growth and increased size in the organs of plants, whether the increase is general or in a single direction. It includes enlargements, or swollen and thickened conditions, which usually result from a disproportionate formation of the cellular tissue as contrasted with the woody framework of the plant, as in the rootstocks of the cultivated carrots, turnips, etc.; elongations, as of roots searching for water; and enation, or excessive development, produced by the action of insects or by parasitic fungi or bacteria. See gall[3].—Concentric hypertrophy, thickening of the heart-wall with diminished cavity.—Eccentric hypertrophy of the heart, increase in size of a heart-cavity, accompanied by hypertrophy of the substance of its wall. Also called hypertrophy with dilatation.—Simple hypertrophy, thickening of the heart-wall with unchanged cavity.

hypertrophy (hī-pėr'trō-fi), v. i.; pret. and pp. hypertrophied, ppr. hypertrophying. [< hypertrophy, n.] To become hypertrophous or enlarged from excessive nutrition.

When a tissue manifests an abnormal tendency to overgrowth, it is said to hypertrophy.
Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i. § 72.

hypertypic (hī-pėr-tip'ik), a. [< hyper- + typic.] Surpassing the type; attypic to an extreme degree. Compare hypotypic.

hypertypical (hī-pėr-tip'i-kąl), a. [< hypertypic + -al.] Same as hypertypic.

They [Oceanic negroes] are represented, in what may be called a hypertypical form, by the extremely dolichocephalic Kai Colos, or mountaineers of the interior of the Feejee Islands.
W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 318.

hypethral, hypæthral (hī-pē'thral), a. [< L. hypæthrus, < Gr. ὑπαίθρος, under the sky, < ὑπό (= L. sub), under, + αἰθήρ, the sky: see ether[1].] Open to the sky; roofless; not covered in; in the open air, as a court, inclosure, or place.

From time immemorial, in hot and rainy lands, a hypæthral court surrounded by a covered portico, either circular or square, was used for the double purpose of church and mart.
R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 74.

To this day the Mohammedan mosque retains the outer hypæthral court.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 209.

It is noticeable, too, in passing, what a hypæthral story it [" Don Quixote "] is, how much of it passes in the open air, how the sun shines, the birds sing, the brooks dance, and the leaves murmur in it.
Lowell, Don Quixote.

In architecture hypethral is specifically applied to a supposed ancient type of building lighted by the omission of a large section of the roof. This notion is based upon interpretations of Vitruvius and the negative evidence afforded until now by the lack of remains explaining methods of lighting among the ruins of Greek temples. It is certain, however, that no Greek temple with its contained art treasures was ever intentionally exposed in this way to the weather. The temples called hypethral by Greek writers were roofless either from accident or from being unfinished. In the smaller Greek temples it is probable that daylight was admitted only by the door, and that it was supplemented by artificial light. In large temples, such as the Parthenon at Athens, of which the cella interior was 100 feet long, it is improbable that the lighting was wholly artificial; but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of its management. It has been conjectured that such interiors were lighted by a system of narrow open channels in the roof, over the side aisles, or by series of apertures in the roof serving as windows, and capable of being closed. There was no break in the ridge-line of the roof, and no superstructure or clearstory ★rising above the roof. See cut under temple.

hypha (hī'fą), n.; pl. hyphæ (-fē). [NL., < Gr. ὑφή, a weaving, a web, < ὑφ-αίνειν, weave, = AS. wéfan, E. weave: see web, weave.] The element of a thallus in Fungi; a cylindric thread-like branched body consisting of a membrane inclosing protoplasm, developing by apical growth, and usually becoming transversely septate as it develops. Göbel. It is the filament or thread of a fungus. The vegetative or growing hyphæ taken in quantity are called the mycelium. The ascogenous hyphæ are the hyphæ or cells from which the asci are derived, as in the sporocarps of some Ascomycetes. See fungus.

hyphæmia, n. See hyphemia.

Hyphæne (hī-fē'nē), n. [NL. (Gärtner, 1801), < Gr. ὑφαίνειν, weave: see hypha.] A genus of palms of the tribe Borasseæ, with branching trunks, each branch terminating in a tuft of large fan-shaped leaves, from among which the branching catkin-like spikes of flowers are produced. The different sexes are in separate trees. The fruit has a thick fibrous rind with a smooth polished skin, inclosing a single hollow seed. Nine species are known, natives of tropical Africa, Arabia, and Madagascar. H. Thebaica is the gingerbread-tree or doom-palm.

hyphæresis, n. See hypheresis.

hyphal (hī'fal), a. [< hypha + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a hypha: as, hyphal tissue.

In Lichens the thallus consists of a hyphal element of anastomosing and interlacing filaments.
Encyc. Brit., IV. 107.

Hyphantes (hī-fan'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑφάντης, a weaver, < ὑφαίνειν, weave: see hypha.] 1. A genus of American orioles, of a family Icteridæ, established by Vieillot in 1816, in the form Yphantes, for such species as the Baltimore oriole and the orchard-oriole. See Icterus, 3.—2. A genus of arachnidans. Billberg, 1820.

Hyphantornis (hī-fan-tôr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑφάντης, a weaver, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A leading genus of African weaver-birds, of the family Ploceidæ, covering a large number of species usually classed under Ploceus or Textor, such as H. cucullata. G. R. Gray, 1840.

Fall Web-worm (Hyphantria cunea), natural size. a, caterpillar; b, pupa; c, moth.

Hyphantria (hī-fan'tri-ą), n. [NL.,

< Gr. ὑφάντρια, fem. of ὑφάντης, a weaver: see Hyphantes.] A genus of bombycid moths, having wings like those of Spilosoma, from which it differs in the labial palpi, of which the second joint is very short, and the terminal joint almost rudimentary. H. cunea is a common species, which forms a web on forest- and shade-trees, in which the larvæ live gregariously; they are known as fall web-worms. Harris, 1841.

hyphasma (hī-faz′mą), n.; pl. hyphasmata (-ma-tą). [NL., < Gr. ὑφασμα, a thing woven, a web, robe, < ὑφαίνειν, weave: see hypha.] 1. In bot., a name formerly applied to certain nonfructifying mycelial growths common in damp, dark places. They probably represent the sterile mycelia of some of the higher fungi.—2. In the Gr. Ch., one of four small pieces of cloth, embroidered with the names or symbols of the evangelists, placed on the angles of the mensa or top of the altar, before it is vested with the catasarca and ependysis.

hyphemia, hyphæmia (hī-fē′mi-ą), n. [NL. hyphæmia, < Gr. ὑφαιμος, suffused with blood, bloodshot, < ὑπό, under, + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol.: (a) Deficiency of blood. (b) Extravasation of blood.

hyphen (hī′fen), n. [< LL. hyphen, n. and adv., < Gr. ὑφέν, a sign (⌣) for joining two syllables or words, also used in music, prob. to indicate that two notes were to be blended together; prop. an adv., ὑφέν, or rather a phrase, ὑφ' ἓν, under one, into one, together, as one word: ὑφ', aspirated form before the rough breathing of ὑπ', the form before a vowel of ὑπό, under; ἓν, neut. acc. of εἷς, one.] 1. In paleography, a curve placed below the line so as to unite the parts of a compound word, and to indicate that they are not to be separated or read as distinct words: as, διοσκουροι—that is, διόσκουροι, not Διὸς κοῦροι; περικλεους—that is, περικλέους, not περὶ κλέους; antevolans—that is, antevolans, not ante volans, etc. In its use the hyphen is the exact opposite of the diastole or hypodiastole.

2. In writing and printing, a short line (-) used to connect two words or elements: namely, (a) to connect two words which are so used as properly to form a compound word; (b) to join syllables which are for any purpose arbitrarily separated, as in regular syllabication (as in el-e-men-tal), at the end of a line to connect the syllables of a divided word (as in the third line of this paragraph), to indicate the pronunciation (as in the respellings for the pronunciations in this dictionary), and to indicate or separate the etymological parts of a word, stem, affixes, etc., often without regard to the syllables (as in element-al, intro-duct-ion, su-spicious). At the end of such an etymological element it indicates a prefix, as a-, in-, pre-, etc.; before an element it indicates a suffix, as -a, -in, -ous, etc.

Hyphen is, as it wer, a band uniting whol wordes joined in composition; as, a hand-maed.
A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

hyphen (hī′fen), v. t. [< hyphen, n.] To join by a hyphen, as two words, so as to form a compound word. Also hyphenize, hyphenate.

hyphenate (hī′fen-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. hyphenated, ppr. hyphenating. [< hyphen + -ate[2].] Same as hyphen.

hyphenation (hī-fe-nā′shọn), n. [< hyphenate + -ion.] The act of joining with a hyphen, or the state of being so joined; use of hyphens.

The folio does not differ in the way of italicising, hyphenation, etc., from scores of books at that time.
The Academy, April 21, 1888, p. 278.

hyphenic (hī-fen′ik), a. [< hyphen + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the hyphen.

The following I should call a hyphenic error.
N. and Q., 1st ser., IV. 204.

hyphenization (hī″fen-i-zā′shọn), n. [< hyphen + -ize + -ation.] The act of hyphening, or the condition of being hyphened.

A neglect of mental hyphenization often leads to mistake as to an author's meaning, particularly in this age of morbid implication. N. and Q., 1st ser., IV. 204.

hyphenize (hī′fen-īz), v. t. Same as hyphen.

hypheresis, hyphæresis (hī-fer′e-sis), n. [NL. hyphæresis, < Gr. ὑφαίρεσις, a taking away, in the omission of a letter, < ὑφαιρεῖν, take away from under, < ὑπό, under, + αἱρεῖν, take.] In philol., the act of taking away or shortening: as, syllabic hypheresis.

hyphodrome (hī′fọ-drōm), a. [< Gr. ὑφή, a weaving, + δρόμος, a running.] In bot., having all the veins except the midrib more or less deeply buried in the thick mesophyl, and very indistinctly visible or wholly concealed: a term introduced into the nomenclature of leaf-nervation by Ettingshausen in 1854. See nervation.

Hyphomycetes (hī″fọ-mī-sē′tēz), n. pl. [NL. (Link, 1824), < Gr. ὑφή, a web (see hypha), + μύκης, pl. μύκητες, a mushroom, fungus.] One of the large groups into which fungi have been divided, characterized by having the spores naked, on simple or branched septate hyphæ. It includes Monilia, Penicillium, etc. In modern systems of classification the Hyphomycetes are referred to what are called Fungi Imperfecti, or imperfectly known forms, many of which are known or suspected to be asexual stages of Ascomycetes. The group includes both parasitic and saprophytic fungi. The genera and species are widely distributed. Also called filamentous fungi.

hyphomycetous (hī″fọ-mī-sē′tus), a. [< Hyphomycetes.] Pertaining or relating to, or characteristic of, the Hyphomycetes; contained in the group Hyphomycetes: as, hyphomycetous fungi.

The Entylomeæ, on the other hand, are simple hyphomycetous forms, and other species, those especially which live in leaves (species of Tilletia and Urocystis), are intermediate between the two extremes.
De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 172.

hyphostroma† (hī-fọ-strō′mą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑφή, a web, + στρῶμα, a bed: see stroma, 2.] In bot., the mycelium or spawn of fungals. Lindley.

hypidiomorphic (hip-id″i-ọ-môr′fik), a. [< hyp-, hypo-, + idiomorphic.] Partially or incompletely idiomorphic.

The order being first plagioclase in more or less idiomorphic lath-shaped individuals lying in all positions, then augite generally allotriomorphic, sometimes hypidiomorphic. Amer. Geologist, I. 204.

hypidiomorphically (hip-id″i-ọ-môr′fi-kạl-i), adv. In a hypidiomorphic manner; not entirely idiomorphically.

The rock is hypidiomorphically granular.
Amer. Naturalist, XXII. 209.

hypinosis (hip-i-nō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἰς (ἰν-), strength, fiber, + -osis.] In pathol., that condition of the blood in which an unusually small amount of fibrin is formed on clotting: opposed to hyperinosis.

hypinotic (hip-i-not′ik), a. [< hypinosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Characterized by deficiency of fibrin.

hypisomerous (hip-ī-som′ẹ-rus), a. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἰσομερής, isomerous: see isomerous.] In odontog., noting molars in which the transverse ridges increase in number by one on successive teeth: opposed to isomerous: correlated with anisomerous.

Hypnæi (hip-nē′ī), n. pl. [NL., < Hypnum, q. v.] A family of pleurocarpous or lateral-fruited mosses, including the single genus Hypnum. Also called Hypneaceæ and Hypneæ.

hypnagogic (hip-na-goj′ik), a. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + ἀγωγός, leading, < ἄγειν, lead.] Leading to sleep; inducing sleep; hypnotic.

It has been noted by H. Meyer of "hypnagogic illusions," and by Gruithuisen of hallucinations which consist in the surviving of dream-images into waking moments, that they can give rise to after-images.
E. Gurney, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 180, note.

Hypnea (hip′nē-ą), n. [NL., < Hypnum, q. v.] A genus of red or purple algæ, belonging to the subclass Florideæ and the family Sphærococcaceæ. They have filiform fronds, virgately branched, with subulate branchlets, composed of an internal layer of large roundish-angular cells, which become smaller outward, and a cortex of small, colored, polygonal cells. The tetraspores are zonate, and the cystocarps are external and borne on the branchlets. The genus contains 25 or 30 species, mostly tropical and ill-defined. H. musciformis is found on the southern coast of New England.

Hypneaceæ (hip-nē-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Agardh, 1876), < Hypnea + -aceæ.] A former order of red algæ, of the subclass Florideæ, including, according to Agardh, the tribes Endocladieæ and Hypneæ and 7 genera.

Hypneæ (hip′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Agardh, 1876), < Hypnea + -eæ.] In bot.: (a) A tribe, or according to some authorities a suborder, of algæ, typified by the genus Hypnea. The fronds are filiform or compressed, and branching; the tetraspores are zonate; and the cystocarps are external or partly immersed, and filled with a spongy cellular mass, in which the spores are borne in small tufts on a branching filamentous placenta. (b) Same as Hypnæi.

hypnobate (hip′nọ-bāt), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + βατός, verbal adj. of βαίνειν, go, = L. venire = E. come.] A sleep-walker; a somnambulist. [Rare.]

hypnobatia (hip-nọ-bā′ti-ą), n. [NL., < hypnobate, q. v.] Somnambulism; a condition of the nervous system which occasions the performance during sleep of actions that normally take place only in the waking state.

★hypnocyst (hip′nọ-sist), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + κύστις, bladder (cyst).] A sleeping cyst; a quiescent encysted protozoan which does not sporulate.

The sclerotia are similar to the hypnocysts and other Protozoa. E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 841.

Some of the Ciliata (notably the common Vorticellæ) have been observed to enclose themselves in cysts; but it does not appear that these are anything more than "hypnocysts," from which the animal emerges unchanged after a period of drought or deficiency of food.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 864.

Hypnodes (hip-nō′dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπνώδης, of a sleepy nature, drowsy, < ὕπνος, sleep, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of crested gallinules, the only species of which is H. cristata, of India, Ceylon, and Java. Reichenbach, 1853.

hypnogenesis (hip-nọ-jen′e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + γένεσις, generation.] The production of hypnotism; induction of the hypnotic state. Also hypnogeny.

hypnogenetic (hip″nọ-jẹ-net′ik), a. [< hypnogenesis, after genetic.] Same as hypnogenous.

Physical methods [of hypnotization], especially hypnogenetic zones, do not exist except as the results of suggestion. Science, XII. 222.

hypnogenetically (hip″nọ-jẹ-net′i-kạl-i), adv. By hypnogenesis; as regards hypnogenesis.

hypnogenic (hip-nọ-jen′ik), a. [< hypnogeny + -ic.] Same as hypnogenous.

Polarizing action is in general hypnogenic.
Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 502.

hypnogenous (hip-noj′e-nus), a. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + -γενής, producing: see -genous.] Producing hypnotism; inducing the hypnotic condition; pertaining to hypnogeny. Also hypnogenetic, hypnogenic.

No attempt . . . has been made to correlate this hypnogenous force or suggestion at a distance with hypnogenous agencies employed in the subject's actual presence.
F. W. H. Myers, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, Oct., 1886, [p. 127.

hypnogeny (hip-noj′e-nī), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + -γένεια: see -geny.] Same as hypnogenesis.

Certain recent events, however, have given special importance to this topic of trance-induction or hypnogeny.
E. Gurney, Mind, XII. 214.

Hypnoideæ (hip-noi′dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypnum + -oideæ.] Same as Hypnæi.

hypnological (hip-nọ-loj′i-kạl), a. Of or pertaining to hypnology.

hypnologist (hip-nol′ọ-jist), n. [< hypnology + -ist.] One versed in hypnology.

hypnology (hip-nol′ọ-ji), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, = L. somnus, sleep, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning sleep.

hypnone (hip′nōn), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, = L. somnus, sleep, + -one.] A crystalline substance (C_8H_8O) fusing at 20.5° C., boiling at 202° C., used in medicine as a hypnotic; acetophenone.

Various other hypnotics have been more recently proposed, such as . . . hypnone and methylal.
Medical News, LII. 547.

hypnophobia (hip-nọ-fō′bi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + φόβος, fear.] A morbid dread of falling asleep.

hypnoscope (hip′nọ-skōp), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + σκοπεῖν, view.] See the extract.

The hypnoscope, which is simply a small hollow magnet to be held on the finger, and, when thus giving rise to peculiar sensations, is claimed to show that the holder is a good hypnotic subject. Science, X. 188.

hypnosis (hip-nō′sis), n. [< Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + -osis.] 1. The production of sleep. Dunglison.—2. The hypnotic state; hypnotism.

In hypnosis, spontaneous or induced, there is often an exaltation of memory. Amer. Jour. of Psychol., I. 514.

hypnosperm (hip′nọ-spėrm), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., a resting spore; in algæ, an oösperm or zygosperm, as the case may be, which after the act of fertilization has taken place sinks to the bottom of the water, where it passes through a period of rest before germinating. Also hypnospore.

It [the zygosperm] then remains dormant through the winter as a resting cell or hypnosperm, germinating in the spring. Bennett and Murray, Crypt. Bot., p. 266.

hypnosporange (hip-nọ-spọ-ranj′), n. [< hypnosporangium.] Same as hypnosporangium.

hypnosporangium (hip″nọ-spọ-ran′ji-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + σπορά, spore, + ἀγγεῖον, a cup.] In bot., a sporangium containing or inclosing hypnospores.

hypnospore (hip′nọ-spōr), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνος, sleep, + σπορά, a spore.] A resting spore; a spore that reposes some time before germinating. Compare hypnosperm.

hypnosporic (hip-nō-spor′ik), a. [< hypnospore + -ic.] After the manner or nature of a hypnospore.

hypnotic (hip-not′ik), a. and n. [= F. hypnotique, < LL. hypnoticus, < Gr. ὑπνωτικός, inclined to sleep, putting to sleep, < ὑπνοῦν, put to sleep, < ὕπνος, sleep, = L. somnus, sleep: see somnolent, etc.] I. a. 1. Having the property of producing sleep; tending to produce sleep; soporific.

The pulse, in from fifteen to thirty minutes after the hypnotic dose is taken, becomes accelerated some six or eight beats in a minute, but falls again to its previous rate before sleep ensues.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 785.

2. Pertaining to or characterized by hypnotism.

According to Weinhold, the hypnotic state begins in a gradual loss of taste, touch, and the sense of temperature; next colors are imperfectly distinguished; then forms grow indistinct; and then the eye is immovable and nothing is seen. The ear never slept in his experiments. The subject believes, and at last does, all that is commanded.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 135.

II. n. 1. A medicine that produces or tends to produce sleep; an opiate; a soporific.

He writes as an hypnotic for the spleen.
Young, To Pope.

It should not be forgotten that the activity of hypnotics is increased by combination. Alien. and Neurol., VIII. 79.

2. One who is subject to hypnotism; one in whom hypnotism has been induced.

In certain cases the hypnotic is insensitive.
Science, XIII. 50.

It is a recognized fact that the senses of hypnotics fall completely under the control of the hypnotizer.
N. A. Rev., CXLVI. 705.

hypnotically (hip-not′i-kal-i), adv. By hypnotism; as regards hypnotism.

It would be a conceivable hypothesis that the trance-condition is produced hypnotically.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 257.

hypnotisable, hypnotisation, etc. See hypnotizable, etc.

hypnotism (hip′nō-tizm), n. [= F. hypnotisme; as hypnot-ic + -ism.] An abnormal state of the mind and nervous system, characterized in varying degree by anæsthesia (sometimes accompanied by special hyperæsthesia), lack of control of the muscles, amnesia, and suggestibility; especially, that variety of this state which is artificially induced, usually by concentrating the attention of the subject upon some single sense impression or upon the operator, who generally seeks to suggest the result by making passes with his hands. When in this state, the mental action and the volition of the subject are to a large extent under the control of the operator. See mesmerism. Also called braidism.

Hypnotism or induced somnambulism, whether accompanied by consciousness or not, has been regarded as covering the whole ground. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 219.

Hypnotism may be regarded as an artificial catalepsy.
Encyc. Brit., XV. 282.

hypnotist (hip′nō-tist), n. [As hypnot-ic + -ist.] One who hypnotizes, or believes in hypnotism.

Attention has been frequently called to the affinity between transference of impressions obtained when the "subject" is in a normal state, and those results which have been held to indicate a special sympathy or "rapport" between a hypnotist or mesmerist and a sensitive "subject." Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 12.

hypnotistic (hip-nō-tis′tik), a. [< hypnotist + -ic.] Relating to or inducing hypnotism.

hypnotizability (hip-nō-tī-za-bil′i-ti), n. [< hypnotizable: see -bility.] Susceptibility to hypnotization.

The author has invented an improved "hypnoscope" or little magnet, to be applied to the finger, and by the sensations then aroused to furnish a criterion of the hypnotizability of the subject. Amer. Jour. of Psychol., I. 520.

hypnotizable (hip′nō-tī-za-bl), a. [< hypnotize + -able.] Susceptible to hypnotizing influences. Also spelled hypnotisable.

A hypnotisable hysterical girl.
Alien. and Neurol., VII. 406.

hypnotization (hip″nō-ti-zā′shon), n. [< hypnotize + -ation.] The act of hypnotizing, or the state of being hypnotized. Also spelled hypnotisation.

Binet holds, many persons who are slightly hypnotizable may resist hypnotization successfully, and ought to be responsible for consenting to submit themselves to the experiment. Science, IX. 221.

hypnotize (hip′nō-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypnotized, ppr. hypnotizing. [As hypnot-ic + -ize.] To bring into the condition of hypnotism. Also spelled hypnotise.

The hypnotising process may carry a sensitive "subject" in a minute or less from a condition of normal waking into hypnotic sleep.
E. Gurney, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 68.

hypnotizer (hip′nō-tī-zėr), n. One who hypnotizes or induces hypnotism in another. Also spelled hypnotiser.

With early hypnotizers, "mesmerizers," or "magnetizers," these experiments were successful, almost without exception, with women only.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 139.

hypnotoid (hip′nō-toid), a. [As hypnot-ic + -oid.] Like hypnotism; somewhat hypnotic; due to or resembling the hypnotic state.

The wonderful hypnotoid sensitiveness, leading up, weeks afterwards, to an accurately-timed hallucination.
Proc. Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, March, 1889, p. 295.

Hypnum (hip′num), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕπνον, moss growing on trees.] The largest genus of mosses, embracing 30 or more subgenera that have by many authors been considered as genera. It belongs to the series Pleurocarpi, in which the fruit is lateral, and sessile upon the stems or branches, and the sexual organs are in axillary buds. The capsule is solid, long-pedicellate, cernuous or horizontal, more or less incurved, not pendent, and very rarely erect and regular. The peristome is double, the outer consisting of 16 strong, densely articulate, lanceolate-acuminate teeth, the inner of a broad membrane divided to (or nearly to) the middle into 16 carinate yellow segments, alternating with the outer teeth and with intermediate cilia, which are either solitary or in groups of 2 or 3. The genus is widely distributed in all parts of the world. There are 200 North American and 90 or more British species. The genus is frequently found in a fossil state, about 30 extinct species having been described from the Miocene and Quaternary deposits of Europe, and from the arctic regions. One species (H. Haydenii) occurs in the Green River group (Eocene) of Colorado.

hypo[1] (hī′pō), n. Like hyp, an abbreviation of hypochondria: commonly in the plural. [Colloq.]

Polly had strictly forbidden us even to mention that corner of the garret to Miss Mehitable, or to ask her leave to look at it, alleging as a reason that "'t would bring on her hypos." H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 333.

hypo[2] (hī′pō), n. In photog., a common abbreviation of hyposulphite of soda, a chemical extensively used in most photographic processes.

hypo-. [L., etc., hypo-, < Gr. ὑπό, prep., under (in all senses), with deriv. meanings through, by, after, etc.; as a prefix, ὑπο-, under, sometimes diminutive in force; = L. sub, under: see sub-.] A prefix of Greek origin, cognate with sub- of Latin origin, and meaning primarily 'under,' either in place or in degree ('less,' 'less than'). Specifically—(a) In chem., indicating a lower place in a series of compounds, or inferior strength, as *hypo*sulphurous acid, the lowest in the series of sulphur acids: opposed to hyper- or per-. (b) In anc. and medieval music: (1) Of intervals, measured downward, as *hypo*diapente: opposed to hyper- and epi-. (2) Of modes and scales, beginning at a lower point, usually a perfect fourth below: opposed to hyper-.

hypoæolian (hī″pō-ē-ō′li-an), a. [< hypo- + Æolian.] See under mode.

hypoaria (hī-pō-ā′ri-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ᾠάριον, dim. of ᾠόν = L. ovum, an egg.] A pair of ganglia developed beneath the optic lobes of typical fishes.

In most osseous fishes the corresponding fibres of the prepyramidal tracts swell out suddenly, beneath the optic lobes, into two protuberant well-defined oval ganglions (hypoaria); their bulk is increased by added grey matter, which variegates their outer surface; they are well developed in the common cod, in which, as in some other fishes, they contain a cavity (hypoarian ventricle).
Owen, Anat. Vert., I. 279.

hypoarian (hī-pō-ā′ri-an), a. Of or relating to the hypoaria.—Hypoarian ventricle, a cavity within each of the hypoaria.

hypobacchius (hī″pō-ba-kī′us), n.; pl. hypobacchii (-ī). [< Gr. ὑποβάκχειος, < ὑπό, under, + βακχεῖος (sc. πούς), bacchius: see bacchius.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of one short time or syllable followed by two longs, thus, ⏑ – –: usually called bacchius. See antibacchius, bacchius, palimbacchius.

hypobasal (hī-pō-bā′sal), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + βάσις, base.] Behind the basal wall: in botany, a term used by Leitgeb to designate the posterior half of the developing proembryo of vascular cryptogams, or that part which becomes the root.

hypoblast (hī′pō-blast), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + βλαστός, a shoot, a bud, a germ.] 1. In bot., the flat dorsal cotyledon of a grass.—2. In biol., the internal or inferior layer of cells of the embryo of metazoic animals, forming the endoderm or innermost membrane: the opposite of epiblast: correlated with mesoblast. From the hypoblast is ultimately developed the lining of the enteric cavity, or the superficial layer of cells of the alimentary canal and its annexes. Also endoblast. Foster and Balfour.

hypoblastic (hī-pō-blas′tik), a. [< hypoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to a hypoblast; developed in or from a hypoblast; endodermal: as, hypoblastic cells.

hypobole (hī-pob′ō-lē), n. [< Gr. ὑποβολή, a throwing under, a suggesting, reminding, < ὑποβάλλειν, throw under, < ὑπό, under, + βάλλειν, throw. Cf. hyperbole.] In rhet., a figure in which several things are mentioned that seem to make against the argument or in favor of the opposite side, but each of which is refuted in order.

Hypobranchia (hī-pō-brang′ki-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + βράγχια, gills.] In zoöl., same as Inferobranchiata, 2.

hypobranchial (hī-pō-brang′ki-al), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + βράγχια, gills.] I. a. Situated below the gills, or beneath the branchial apparatus in general.—Hypobranchial groove, in ascidians, the endostyle.

II. n. The internal piece of the inferior part of the branchial arch in fishes.

Hypobranchiata (hī-pō-brang-ki-ā′tą), n. pl. [NL., as Hypobranchia + -ata[2].] Same as Inferobranchiata, 2.

hypobranchiate (hī-pō-brang′ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hypobranchia; inferobranchiate.

hypobromite (hī-pō-brō′mīt), n. [< hypobrom-ous + -ite[2].] A salt of hypobromous acid.

hypobromous (hī-pō-brō′mus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. brom(ine) + -ous.] Used only in the following phrase:—Hypobromous acid, $HBrO$, an acid known only in its aqueous solution, which is a light-yellow liquid having a strong oxidizing action and a bleaching effect.

hypocarpogean (hī-pō-kär-pō-jē′an), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + καρπός, fruit, + γῆ, the earth.] Same as hypogeal. [Rare.]

hypocastanum† (hī-pō-kas′tą-num), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + κάστανα, chestnuts: see Castanea, chesten.] A brown lake prepared from the horse-chestnut; chestnut-brown.

hypocatharsis (hī″pō-ka-thär′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποκάθαρσις, in lit. sense a purging downward, < ὑποκαθαίρειν, purge downward: see catharsis.] In pathol., a slight purging.

hypocaust (hip′ō-kâst), n. [< L. hypocaustum, hypocauston, < Gr. ὑπόκαυστον, a vaulted room heated by a furnace below, < ὑποκαίειν, burn or heat from below, < ὑπό, under, below, + καίειν, burn, > καυστός, verbal adj.: see caustic.] In arch., an arched fire-chamber, from which heat is distributed through earthenware pipes to the rooms above it. The term is also sometimes applied to a fireplace, furnace, or oven.

The stube, or stove, of a German inn derived its name from the great hypocaust, which is always strongly heated to secure the warmth of the apartment in which it is placed.
Scott, Anne of Geierstein, xix.

In the rear were the reservoirs to contain the requisite supply of water, and below them the hypocaust or furnace, by which it [the baths of Caracalla] was warmed with a degree of scientific skill we hardly give the Romans of that age credit for. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 332.

Hypocephalidæ (hī″pō-se-fal′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Le Conte, 1876), < Hypocephalus + -idæ.] A peculiar and anomalous family of Coleoptera, represented by the genus Hypocephalus.

Hypocephalus (hī-pō-sef′ą-lus), n. [NL. (Desmarest, 1832), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + κεφαλή, head.] An aberrant genus of beetles, the type of the family Hypocephalidæ, represented by one species, H. armatus of Brazil. This beetle is nearly 3 inches long, and of strange form, having an enormous prothorax and curiously curved spiny legs. The position of the genus has been much disputed; Burmeister and others place it with the prionine group of cerambycids, while Le Conte considers it to be allied to the rhynchophorous series.

hypochil (hip′ō-kil), n. Same as hypochilium.

hypochilium (hī-pō-kil′i-um), n.; pl. hypochilia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + χεῖλος, the lip.] In bot., the lower part of the labellum or lip of certain orchids.

hypochlorite (hī-pō-klō′rīt), n. [< hypochlorous + -ite[2].] In chem., a salt of hypochlorous acid. The hypochlorites are usually prepared by leading chlorin gas into a solution of an alkali hydroxid, or over solid calcium hydroxid. Calcium hypochlorite is the chief constituent of bleaching-powder.

hypochlorous (hī-pō-klō′rus), a. [< hypo- + chlorous.] In chem., applied to an acid ($HClO$) having marked bleaching properties, obtained in solution by treating bleaching-powder with mercuric oxid. It is the active principle of bleaching-powder.

Hypochœrideæ (hī-pō-kē-rid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Hypochœris (-id-) + -eæ.] A tribe of cichoriaceous plants, typified by the genus Hypochœris. They are annual or perennial herbs with radical leaves, scapiform stems, the bracts of the involucre in many imbricated series, more or less contracted achenia, and plumose or simple pappus.

Hypochœris (hī-pō-kē′ris), n. [< Gr. ὑποχοιρίς, a plant of the succory kind, appar. (?) < ὑπό, under, + χοῖρος, a pig.] A genus of yellow-flowered herbs, of the family Cichoriaceæ, and type of the tribe Hypochœrideæ. About 50 species are known, distributed over temperate portions of the world. H. radicata of Europe and Asia, also sparingly introduced into the United States, is the cat's-ear. Also written Hypochæris.

hypochon† (hip′ō-kon), n. An abbreviation of hypochondria[1]. Davies. [Rare.]

You have droop'd within a few years into such a dispirited condition that 'tis as much as a plentiful dose of the best canary can do to remove the hypocon for a few minutes. Tom Brown, Works, II. 233.

hypochonder† (hī-pō-kon′dėr), n. [< hypochondrium, q. v.] Same as hypochondrium.

hypochondria[1] (hī-pō- or hip-ō-kon′dri-ą), n. [= F. hypochondrie = Sp. hipocondría = Pg. hypocondria = It. ipocondria = G. hypochondrie = Dan. Sw. hypokondri, < ML. hypochondria, fem. sing., the morbid condition so called, supposed to have its seat in the upper part of the abdomen, < NL. hypochondrium.] A morbid condition characterized by exaggerated uneasiness and anxiety as to one's health, and also by extreme general depression; low spirits: in this sense often abbreviated hypo, or formerly hyp, hip. See hypo[1], hip[4]. Hypochondria, real or affected, was formerly also called spleen, vapors, and other vague names. Also hypochondriacism, hypochondriasis, hypochondriasm.

hypochondria[2], n. Plural of hypochondrium.

hypochondriac (hī-pō- or hip-ō-kon′dri-ak), a. and n. [< F. hypochondriaque = Sp. hipocondríaco = Pg. hypocondriaco = It. ipocondriaco (cf. D. G. hypochondrisch = Dan. Sw. hypokondrisk) (see hypochondria[1]), < NL. hypochondriacus, < Gr. ὑποχονδριακός, affected in the hypochondrium, < ὑποχόνδριον: see hypochondrium.]

I. a. 1. In anat.: (a) Situated below the cartilages of the ribs — that is, under the "short ribs": specifically applied in human anatomy to the region of either hypochondrium. See third cut under abdominal. (b) Same as hypochondrial. — 2. In entom., of or pertaining to the hypochondria, or basal ventral plates of the abdomen: as, the hypochondriac segment. — 3. In pathol., suffering from hypochondria; morbidly anxious about one's health, and affected with general depression of spirits; also, characteristic of or produced by hypochondria.

Democritus, that thought to laugh the times into goodness, seems to me as deeply hypochondriac as Heraclitus that bewailed them. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 4.

Seized with an hypochondriac alarm at every new sensation. Macaulay, Mitford's Hist. Greece.

There was a pleasurable illumination in your eye occasionally, a soft excitement in your aspect, which told of no bitter, bilious, hypochondriac brooding. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxvii.

II. n. A person affected with hypochondria; one who is morbidly anxious about his health, and generally depressed.

Terrour has frequently excited languid hypochondriacs to exertions they had deemed impossible. T. Cogan, On the Passions, I. ii. 3.

These hypochondriacs are the torments of their physicians, and think they are insulted if their complaints are called imaginary. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 97.

hypochondriacal (hī″pō- or hip″ō-kon-drī′ą-kąl), a. [< hypochondriac + -al.] Same as hypochondriac, 3.

hypochondriacally (hī″pō- or hip″ō-kon-drī′ą-kąl-i), adv. In a hypochondriac or melancholy manner.

hypochondriacism (hī″pō- or hip″ō-kon-drī′ą-sizm), n. [< hypochondriac + -ism.] Same as hypochondria[1].

hypochondrial (hī-pō-kon′dri-ąl), a. [< hypochondrium + -al.] Situated upon the flanks: as, hypochondrial feathers. Also hypochondriac. Macgillivray.

hypochondriasis (hī″pō- or hip″ō-kon-drī′ą-sis), n. [NL., a more correct term for hypochondria[1]; < hypochondrium + -iasis.] Same as hypochondria[1].

hypochondriasm (hī-pō- or hip-ō-kon′dri-azm), n. [< hypochondria[1] + -asm.] Same as hypochondria[1].

hypochondriast (hī-pō- or hip-ō-kon′dri-ast), n. [< hypochondria[1] + -ast.] One afflicted with hypochondria; a hypochondriac.

hypochondrie† (hī′pō-kon-dri), n. Same as hypochondry.

hypochondrium (hī-pō-kon′dri-um), n.; pl. hypochondria (-ą). [NL. (formerly Englished hypochondry, pl. hypochondries, and hypochonder, < F. hypochondre), < L. hypochondrium (in pl.), < Gr. ὑποχόνδριον, pl. ὑποχόνδρια, the soft part of the body below the cartilage and above the navel, < ὑπό, under, + χόνδρος, a corn, grain, gristle, cartilage, esp. of the breast-bone: see chondrus. Hence hypochondria[1], q. v.] 1. In anat.: (a) In human anat., a superior and lateral part of the abdomen, beneath the lower ribs; one of the specific regions of the abdomen, situated on either side of the epigastrium, above the lumbar regions. See abdominal regions, under abdominal. (b) Some abdominal region corresponding to the above, as the flank or side of the rump of a bird; an iliac region. — 2. pl. In entom., two lateral pieces at the base of the abdomen beneath, behind the metasternum and posterior coxæ: so called by Kirby. They are found in many Coleoptera, etc., and are really parts of the first ventral segment, which is hidden in the middle.

hypochondry† (hī′pō-kon-dri), n. Same as hypochondrium.

If from the liver, there is usually a pain in the right hypocondrie. If from the spleene, hardnesse and grief in the left hypocondrie, a rumbling, much appetite, and small digestion. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 200.

hypocist (hī′pō-sist), n. [< NL. hypocistis, < L. hypocisthis, < Gr. ὑποκιστίς, improp. ὑποκισθίς, a parasitic plant which grows on the roots of the cistus, < ὑπό, under, below, + κίστος, cistus.] An inspissated juice obtained from a plant, Hypocistis Hypocistis, family Rafflesiaceæ. The juice is expressed from the unripe fruit, evaporated to the consistence of an extract, formed into cakes, and dried in the sun. It is an astringent, useful in diarrheas and hemorrhages.

hypoclidia, n. Plural of hypoclidium.

hypoclidian (hī-pō-klī′di-ąn), a. Of or pertaining to the hypoclidium: as, a hypoclidian process. Also hypocleidian.

hypoclidium (hī-pō-klī′di-um), n.; pl. hypoclidia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + κλείς (κλειδ-), a key, the clavicle.] In ornith., the interclavicular element of the clavicles of a bird; an inferomedian process of the united clavicles. It is well shown in the common fowl, where the hypoclidium is the thin flat rounded bit of bone at the junction of the legs of the merrythought or wishbone. See cut under furcula. Also hypocleidium.

hypocoracoid (hī-pō-kor′ą-koid), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. coracoid.] In ichth., the lower one of two bones which bear the actinosts or base of the pectoral fin in most fishes. It was considered to be homologous with the cubital by Cuvier, with the radius by Owen, and with the coracoid by later ichthyotomists.

hypocoristic (hī″pō-kō-ris′tik), a. and n. In Gr. and Lat. gram., same as diminutive.

hypocotyl (hī′pō-kot-il), n. [Short for hypocotyledonous stem.] In bot., that part of the axis which is below the cotyledons. Also called the caulicle, and erroneously the radicle.

With seedlings the stem which supports the cotyledons (i. e. the organs which represent the first leaves) has been called by many botanists the "hypocotyledonous stem," but for brevity's sake we will speak of it merely as the hypocotyl. Darwin, Movement in Plants, Int., p. 5.

hypocotyledonary (hī-pō-kot-i-lē′dọn-ą-ri), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + κοτυληδών, cotyledon, + -ary.] Pertaining to or resembling the hypocotyl or hypocotyledonous stem.

Water-plants; seed with little or no endosperm, but a strongly developed hypocotyledonary axis to the embryo. Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 553.

hypocotyledonous (hī-pō-kot-i-lē′dọn-us), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + κοτυληδών, cotyledon, + -ous.] In bot., situated under or supporting the cotyledons. Darwin. See hypocotyl.

hypocotylous (hī-pō-kot′i-lus), a. [< hypocotyl + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the hypocotyl. Nature.

hypocrass†, n. A former spelling of hippocras.

hypocrater (hī-pō-krā′tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑποκρατήριον, the stand of a crater, < ὑπό, under, + κρατήρ, a mixing-vessel: see crater.] In archæol., a stand or foot designed to support a crater or a vase of similar form, particularly an apodal vase. See cut under dinos.

hypocrateriform (hī″pō-krą-ter′i-fôrm), a. [< Gr. ὑποκρατήριον, the stand of a crater (see hypocrater), + L. forma, shape.] In bot., salver-shaped: an epithet applied to a corolla consisting of a straight tube surmounted by a flat and spreading limb, as in the cowslip and phlox.

hypocraterimorphous (hī″pō-krą-ter-i-môr′fus), a. [NL., < Gr. ὑποκρατήριον, the stand of a crater, + μορφή, form.] Same as hypocrateriform.

hypocrisy (hi-pok′ri-si), n.; pl. hypocrisies (-siz). [< ME. hypocrisie, ypocrisie, etc., < OF. ypocrisie, hypocrisie = Pr. ypocrisia = Sp. hipocresía = Pg. hypocrisia = It. ipocrisia, < LL. hypocrisis, hypocrisy, also an imitation of a person's speech and gestures, < Gr. ὑπόκρισις, a reply, an orator's delivery, hypocrisy, < ὑποκρίνεσθαι, answer, play a part, < ὑπό, under, + κρίνεσθαι, contend, dispute: see crisis, critic.] Dissimulation of one's real character or belief; especially, a false assumption of piety or virtue; a feigning to be better than one is; the action or character of a hypocrite.

In fraytour thei faren best of all the foure orders,
And [vsen] ypocricie in all that they werchen.
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 284.

Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. Luke xii. 1.

Next stood Hypocrisy, with holy leer,
Soft smiling and demurely looking down,
But hid the dagger underneath the gown.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 564.

This then is hypocrisy — not simply for a man to deceive others, knowing all the while that he is deceiving them, but to deceive himself and others at the same time. J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 127.

=Syn. Pretense, cant, formalism, sanctimoniousness, Pharisaism. See dissemble, dissembler, and deceit.

hypocrite (hip′ō-krit), n. [< ME. hypocrite, ypocrite, < OF. hypocrite, F. hypocrite = Pr. ypocrita = Sp. hipócrita = Pg. hypocrita = It. ipocrita, ipocrito, < LL. hypocrita, a hypocrite; L., a mimic who accompanied the delivery of an actor by gestures; < Gr. ὑποκριτής, one who answers, a player, also a pretender, hypocrite, < ὑποκρίνεσθαι, answer, play a part: see hypocrisy.] One who assumes a false appearance; one who feigns to be what he is not, or to feel or believe what he does not actually feel or believe; especially, a false pretender to virtue or piety.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. Mat. xxiii. 27.

The fawning, sneaking, and flattering hypocrite, that will do or be any thing for his own advantage, is despised by those he courts, hated by good men, and at last tormented by his own conscience. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. i.

=Syn. Dissembler, Hypocrite (see dissembler); Pharisee, formalist, cheat.

hypocritely† (hip′ō-krit-li), adv. Hypocritically.

He is re-hardned: like a stubborn Boy
That plies his Lesson, Hypocritely coy.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Lawe.

hypocritic (hip-ō-krit′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑποκριτικός, acting a part, < ὑποκριτής: see hypocrite.] Hypocritical. [Rare.]

hypocritical (hip-ō-krit′i-kąl), a. [< hypocritic + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or proceeding from hypocrisy; characterized by hypocrisy; dissembling; feigned.

Indeed it is an easie matter for any to make a slight formal profession, to run in a round of hypocriticall duties, and live a moral civil life. Hopkins, Works, p. 733.

Make thy choice whether still to be subtle, worldly, selfish, iron-hearted, and hypocritical, or to tear these sins out of thy nature, though they bring the life-blood with them! Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xviii.

=Syn. Dissembling, insincere, hollow, sham; sanctimonious, canting, pharisaical.

hypocritically (hip-ō-krit′i-kąl-i), adv. In a hypocritical manner; with hypocrisy; without sincerity.

Simeon and Levi spake not only falsely, but insidiously, nay hypocritically. Government of the Tongue.

hypocritish† (hip′ō-krit-ish), a. [< hypocrite + -ish[1].] Hypocritical.

The Lord . . . hath gathered him a flock, to whom he hath given ears to hear that the hypocritish wolves cannot hear. Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 49.

hypocycloid (hī-pō-sī′kloid), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. cycloid.] In geom., a curve described by a point on the circumference of a circle which rolls upon the inside of another circle.

Hypocycloid. — C is the center of the fixed, c of the moving, circle; P is the point of the latter whose path is traced.

hypodactylum (hī-pō-dak′ti-lum), n.; pl. hypodactyla (-lą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + δάκτυλος, finger, toe.] In ornith., the under side of the toe of a bird: opposed to acrodactylum. [Rare.]

hypoderm (hī′pō-dėrm), n. [< NL. hypoderma.] 1. In bot., same as hypoderma, 1. — 2. In arthropods, an epithelial integumentary layer below ★the cuticular or chitinized crust.

hypoderma (hī-pō-dėr′mą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + δέρμα(τ-), skin.] 1. In bot., the layer of colorless cells just beneath the epidermis of a leaf; also extended to the external cortex under the epidermis of a stem: introduced in the first sense by Kraus (1865). It is most commonly collenchyma. Also hypoderm.—2. [cap.] A genus of hypodermic dipterous insects, or botflies, of the family Œstridæ, species of which live under the skin of various ruminant and other hoofed quadrupeds. H. bovis is the bot-fly of the ox. A related species, H. Lineata, is known in Texas as the heel-fly, from attacking the heels of cattle. Clark, 1815.—3. [cap.] A genus of chiropterous mammals, or bats. Geoffroy, 1829.

hypodermal (hī-pō-dėr'mal), a. and n. [As hypoderm-ic + -al.] I. a. 1. Same as hypodermic.—2. Of or pertaining to the hypoderma.

II. n. In sponges, a hypodermale.

hypodermale (hī″pō-dėr-mā'lē), n.; pl. hypodermalia (-li-ą). [NL.: see hypodermal.] A pentact sponge-spicule of the outer surface, with immersed radial ray only. F. E. Schulze.

hypodermatic (hī″pō-dėr-mat'ik), a. and n. [As hypoderm-ic + -atic[2].] I. a. Same as hypodermic. [Rare.]

I should resort to hypodermatic injections.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 11.

II. n. A hypodermic injection.

I again administered the hypodermatic of morphia.
Medical News, LII. 293.

hypodermatically (hī″pō-dėr-mat'i-kąl-i), adv. Hypodermically.

It is, moreover, impossible to use the bichloride hypodermatically about the legs without producing abscesses.
Medical News, LII. 273.

Hypodermiæ (hī-pō-dėr'mi-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + δέρμα, the skin.] A division of fungi, propagated, so far as known, only by asexual spores, and growing under and through the epidermis of living plants. By Fries it was called an order, including the Ustilaginaceæ and Uredinaceæ as suborders. De Bary (1861) made it one of the four groups into which he divided the fungi, without altering its application. In Cohn's system of classification (1872) it was made a section of the order Basidiosporeæ, still including, however, the Ustilaginaceæ and Uredinaceæ. The studies of De Bary and others have thrown much additional light upon the life-history of these forms, with the result of showing that the two groups are not very closely related. Consequently, by later systematists the Uredinales have been raised to the rank of an order, and the Ustilaginaceæ included in the order Ustilaginales, the division Hypodermiæ being abandoned.

hypodermic (hī-pō-dėr'mik), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + δέρμα, the skin (cf. hypoderm), + -ic.] I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to parts under the skin; subcutaneous; employed in introducing foreign substances under the skin: specifically applied to a mode of administering medicines by introducing them under the skin: as, a hypodermic syringe.

The galvanic excitation of the lower limb, or the hypodermic injection of strychnine into it.
Prize Essays, Conn. Med. Soc., 1868.

2. Burrowing in or under the skin; infesting the integuments: as, a hypodermic insect.—3. Of or pertaining to the hypoderm in arthropods: as, a hypodermic layer; hypodermic cells.

II. n. 1. In med., a remedy introduced under the skin, as morphia or other narcotic agent.—2. A hypodermic injection or syringe.

hypodermical (hī-pō-dėr'mi-kąl), a. Same as hypodermic.

hypodermically (hī-pō-dėr'mi-kąl-i), adv. In a hypodermic manner; under the skin.

hypodermis (hī-pō-dėr'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποδερμίς, lit. underskin, < ὑπό, under, + δέρμα, skin.] 1. In annelids, as the earthworm, a thick layer, below the cuticula, of reticulated or nucleated tissue, in the meshes of which is a copious transparent gelatinous substance. It is considered by some as probably representing both the dermis and the epidermis of other animals.—2. In entom., a soft cellular substance or tissue lining the abdominal wall of an insect, within the chitinous investment. The more superficial parts of it represent an ectoderm or epidermis, the ★deeper portion being a parietal layer of the mesoderm.

hypodermoclysis (hī″pō-dėr-mok'li-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + δέρμα, skin, + κλύσις, a drenching by a clyster.] The injection of a liquid, as salt water, under the skin, with a view to replenishing the blood.

hypodiapason (hī-pō-dī-ą-pā'zon), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + διαπασῶν, diapason: see diapason.] In early music, the interval of an octave when measured downward; a suboctave.

hypodiapente (hī-pō-dī-ą-pen'tē), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + διὰπεντε, diapente: see diapente.] In early music, the interval of a perfect fifth when measured downward.

hypodiastole (hī″pō-dī-as'tǫ-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποδιαστολή, a slight stop, a mark to divide the syllables of a word, < ὑπό, under, + διαστολή, a separation: see diastole.] In Gr. gram., same as diastole, 3.

hypodiatessaron (hī-pō-dī-ą-tes'ą-ron), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + διατεσσάρων, diatessaron: see diatessaron.] In early music, the interval of a perfect fourth when measured downward.

hypodiazeuxis (hī-pō-dī-ą-zūk'sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + διάζευξις, diazeuxis: see diazeuxis.] In early music, the separation of two tetrachords by the interval of a fifth, as between the meson and the diezeugmenon. See tetrachord.

hypodidascalt (hī″pō-di-das'kąl), n. [< L. hypodidascalus, < Gr. ὑποδιδάσκαλος, an underteacher, < ὑπό, under, + διδάσκαλος, a teacher: see didascalic.] An under-teacher. [Rare.]

There is the star of eloquence, under whom I am an hypodidascal—in English, his usher.
Shirley, Love Tricks, iii. 5.

hypoditone (hī-pō-dī'tōn), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + δίτονον, the major third: see ditone.] In early music, the interval of a major third when measured downward.

hypodorian (hī-pō-dō'ri-ąn), a. [< hypo- + Dorian.] See under mode.

hypodorianic (hī-pō-dō-ri-an'ik), a. [< hypodorian + -ic.] See under mode.

hypogæal, hypogæan, etc. See hypogeal, etc.

Hypogæi (hī-pō-jē'ī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of LL. hypogæus, hypogeus, underground: see hypogeal.] A suborder of gasteromycetous fungi (Berkeley), resembling the truffles in their habit of underground growth.

hypogastria, n. Plural of hypogastrium.

hypogastric (hī-pō-gas'trik), a. [< hypogastrium + -ic.] In anat., situated below the stomach; specifically, of or pertaining to the hypogastrium.—Hypogastric artery, the principal branch of the internal iliac artery of the fetus, passing out of the body at the navel, and along the umbilical cord to the placenta, whence also called umbilical artery. There are a pair of these arteries, right and left. After birth the portion of each which is outside the body is cast off, and that portion within the body which becomes an impervious cord takes part in the formation of the urachus, while a small portion which remains pervious becomes known as the superior vesical artery. See cut under embryo.—Hypogastric lobe of the carapace of a brachyurous crustacean, one of the posterolateral subdivisions of the carapace. See cut under Brachyura.—Hypogastric plexuses, plexuses of sympathetic nerves derived from the aortic plexus.—Hypogastric region, the hypogastrium. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.

hypogastrium (hī-pō-gas'tri-um), n.; pl. hypogastria (-ą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπογάστριον, the lower belly, neut. of ὑπογάστριος, pertaining to the lower part of the belly, abdominal, < ὑπό, under, below, + γαστήρ, belly.] In human anat., the lower part of the belly; an abdominal region below the umbilical region and between the right and left iliac or inguinal regions. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.

hypogastrocele (hī-pō-gas'trō-sēl), n. [< Gr. ὑπογάστριον, the lower belly, + κήλη, a tumor.] In pathol., a hernia through the walls of the lower belly.

hypogea, n. Plural of hypogeum.

hypogeal, hypogæal (hī-pō-jē'ąl), a. [< LL. hypogeus, hypogæus, < Gr. ὑπόγειος, later Attic ὑπόγαιος, under the earth, underground, subterranean, < ὑπό, under, + γῆ, γαῖα, the earth, the ground.] Subterranean; underground; in bot., growing beneath the surface of the earth, as parts of plants, or in a few instances entire plants, as the truffle and the tuckahoe. Also hypogeous, hypogæous, hypogean, hypogæan.

This Roman site . . . is certain to reveal a rich hypogeal harvest if it be systematically approached.
Athenæum, No. 3067, p. 182.

hypogean, hypogæan (hī-pō-jē'ąn), a. [As hypogeal + -an.] Same as hypogeal.

In any hypogean insect which continually uses its claws in burrowing, the need of shedding and renewal of those organs is apparent.
Science, V. 519.

hypogee (hī'pǫ-jē), n. [< L. hypogeum: see hypogeum.] Same as hypogeum.

The earlier accounts of the painted hypogees of Etruria.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 177.

hypogeiodyt (hī-pō-jī'ǫ-di), n. [< Gr. ὑπόγειος, underground (see hypogeal), + ὁδός, way.] The art of laying out mines and tunnels and of mapping caves; subterranean surveying. Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

hypogene (hī'pǫ-jēn), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + -γενής, -produced: see -gen.] Produced or formed under or below (the earth's surface); nether-formed; specifically, in geol., said of rocks which have assumed their present form and structure beneath the surface; Plutonic: a term applied more especially to the granitic rocks: opposed to epigene.

I proposed in the Principles of Geology the term "hypogene," . . . a word implying the theory that granite, gneiss, and the other crystalline formations are alike nether formed rocks, or rocks which have not assumed their present form and structure on the surface.
Lyell, Elem. of Geology (ed. 1865), p. 9.

Hypogene or Plutonic action. The changes within the earth caused by original internal heat and by chemical action. A. Geikie, Geology (2d ed.), p. 178.

hypogenous (hī-poj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + -γενής, -produced (cf. hypogene), + -ous.] 1. Produced below or upon the under surface: applied to fungi growing upon the under side of leaves: distinguished from epigenous and epiphyllous. Also hypophyllous.—2. Growing beneath the surface, as the cephalodia of some lichens. Also hypomenous.

hypogeous, hypogæous (hī-pō-jē'us), a. [< LL. hypogæus, underground: see hypogeal.] Same as hypogeal.

hypogeum, hypogæum (hī-pō-jē'um), n.; pl. hypogea, hypogæa (-ą). [L., < Gr. ὑπόγειον, ὑπόγαιον, an underground chamber, neut. of ὑπόγειος, ὑπόγαιος, underground: see hypogeal.] In arch., Hypogeum.—Tomb of Khnoumhotpou, at Beni-Hassan, Egypt, showing the so-called proto-Doric columns.

that part of a building which is below the level of the ground, including cellars, vaults, etc.; also, any underground construction, chamber, etc., as the syringes of ancient Egypt, or the tombs of the Etruscans. Also hypogee.

The tombs of Beni Hassan . . . are situated on the eastern side of the Nile, and are almost the only hypogea that are so placed in Egypt. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 110.

A series of hypogea or caves sunk in the solid rock.
Encyc. Brit., II. 395.

hypogeusia (hī-pō-jö'si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + γεῦσις, the sense of taste, < γεύειν, give to taste: see gust[2].] Diminution of the sense of taste.

hypoglossal (hī-pō-glos'ąl), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + γλῶσσα, the tongue, + -al. Cf. hypoglossis.] I. a. Situated under the tongue, wholly or in part: specifically applied to a pair of nerves.—Hypoglossal nerve, either of the twelfth or last pair of cranial nerves of most vertebrates. It is the motor nerve of the tongue and associate parts. In man the hypoglossal arises from the medulla oblongata by several filaments, in a line with the anterior roots of the spinal nerves, leaves the cranial cavity by the anterior condyloid foramen, descends the neck deeply to a point opposite the angle of the lower jaw, winds around the origin of the occipital artery, crosses the carotid, and enters the substance of the tongue between the mylohyoid muscle and the hyoglossal. See second cut under brain.

II. n. A hypoglossal nerve. Also hypoglossus.

hypoglossi, n. Plural of hypoglossus.

hypoglossis, hypoglottis (hī-pō-glos'is, -glot'-is), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπογλωσσίς, ὑπογλωττίς, a swelling on the under side of the tongue, the under surface of the tongue, < ὑπό, under, + γλῶσσα, γλῶττα, the tongue.] 1. In anat., the under part of the tongue.—2. Anything under the tongue. (a) In pathol., a sublingual tumor. See ranula. (b) A lozenge or pill to be kept under the tongue till dissolved. 3. In entom., an outer division of the mentum, generally concealed or aborted, but visible in certain Coleoptera.

hypoglossus (hī-pō-glos'us), n.; pl. hypoglossi (-ī). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + γλῶσσα, tongue.] 1. In ichth.: (a) A nerve of some fishes, as sharks, formed by the coalescence of the ventral or anterior roots of the last three cranial nerves, and extending to certain muscles of the shoulder-girdle. (b) [cap.] A genus of fishes, containing the halibut: same as Hippoglossus. Smith, 1833.—2. In anat., same as hypoglossal.

hypognathism (hī-pog'nā-thizm), n. [As hypognath-ous + -ism.] The quality or condition of being hypognathous. Coues, 1864.

hypognathous (hī-pog'nā-thus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + γνάθος, jaw.] In ornith., having the under mandible longer than the upper, as the black skimmer, Rhynchops nigra: applied either to the bird or to its beak. Coues. See cut under Rhynchops.

hypogonation (hī″pō-gō-nat′i-on), n. [< MGr. ὑπογονάτιον, a kneeling-cushion, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + γόνυ = E. knee.] Same as epigonation.

hypogyn (hī′pō-jin), n. [As hypogyn-ous.] A hypogynous plant.

Hypogynæ (hī-poj′i-nē), n. pl. [NL.] A division of sympetalous plants proposed by Sachs, in which the corolla is hypogynous. It includes his Tubifloræ with 5 orders, the Labiatifloræ with 11 orders, the Diandræ with 2 orders, and the Contorteæ with 5 orders.

hypogynic (hī-pō-jin′ik), a. [As hypogyn-ous + -ic.] Inserted in a hypogynous manner: said of parts of a flower.

hypogynous (hī-poj′i-nus), a. [< NL. hypogynus*, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + γυνή, female (mod. bot. pistil, ovary).] In bot., situated beneath the pistil: applied to parts which, as in the Ranunculaceæ, are inserted or borne on the receptacle of the flower, which has the sepals, petals, numerous stamens, and many or few pistils, all distinct and unconnected and inserted upon the torus or axis, with the pistils at the summit. —Hypogynous insertion. See insertion.

hypogyny (hī-poj′i-ni), n. [As hypogyn-ous + -y.] In bot., the condition or state of being hypogynous.

Hypohippus (hī-pō-hip′us), n. [NL., prop. hyphippus*, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ἵππος, horse.] A genus of extinct perissodactyl ungulate mammals, of the family Anchitheriidæ. J. Leidy.

hypoiastian, hypoiastianic (hī″pō-ī-as′ti-an, -an′ik), a. [< hypo- + Iastian.] See under mode.

hypoionian, hypoionianic (hī″pō-ī-ō′ni-an, -an′ik), a. [< hypo- + Ionian.] See under mode.

hypojacobian (hī-pō-ja-kō′bi-an), a. [< hypo- + Jacobian.] In math., formed from a rectangular Jacobian matrix of one more variable than function by omitting one column.

hypokinetic (hī-pō-ki-net′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + κινητικός, moving: see kinetic.] Exhibiting less than the normal amount of action.

hypolais (hī-pō-lā′is), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπολαΐς, some small bird.] 1. In ornith., an old (Aristotelian) name of some small European bird, perhaps a warbler, sylvia, or beccafico, made by Aldrovandi the same as curruca. Hence—(a) In the form hippolais, the Linnean specific name of the icterine warbler, Motacilla hippolais, the Sylvia hypolais of other writers. (b) [cap.] A genus of small sylviine warblers of Europe, etc., of which the icterine warbler, Hypolais icterina, is the type: synonymous with Asilus, Curruca, Ficedula, etc. J. J. Kaup, 1829; Cabanis, 1850. Also written Hippolais. C. L. Brehm, 1828.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of pyralid moths. Guenée, 1854.

Hypolepideæ (hī-pol-e-pid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fée), < Hypolepis (-id-) + -eæ.] A tribe of polypodiaceous ferns, typified by the genus Hypolepis, now referred to the tribe Pteridеæ.

Hypolepis (hī-pol′e-pis), n. [NL. (Bernhardi), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + λεπίς, a scale, husk.] A genus of polypodiaceous ferns, of the tribe Pteridеæ, the type of the old tribe Hypolepideæ. The sori are marginal, placed usually in the sinuses of the frond, small, subglobose, uniform, and distinct. The fronds are from twice to four times pinnate, with free veins. About a dozen species are known, widely distributed in tropical countries.

hypolydian (hī-pō-lid′i-an), a. [< hypo- + Lydian.] See under mode.

Hypolytreæ (hī-pō-lit′rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nees, 1834), < Hypolytrum + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Cyperaceæ, typified by the genus Hypolytrum.

Hypolytrum (hī-pol′i-trum), n. [NL. (Richard, 1805), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + λύτρον, a plant, loosestrife.] A genus of monocotyledonous rush-like plants, of the family Cyperaceæ, type of the tribe Hypolytreæ. The inflorescence is in fascicled or corymbose roundish panicles, which are many-flowered; there are 2 hypogynous, keeled, and compressed scales, the exterior one being the largest; there is no calyx; and the stamens are 2 or 3 in number. About 25 species are known, widely dispersed in tropical and subtropical countries.

hypomanikion (hī″pō-ma-nik′i-on), n. [< MGr. ὑπομανίκιον, also ὑπομάνικον, < Gr. ὑπό, under, + μανίκιον, sleeve: see epimanikion.] Same as epimanikion.

hypomanikon (hī-pō-man′i-kon), n. Same as epimanikion.

hypomenous (hī-pom′e-nus), a. [Irreg. < Gr. ὑπομένειν, stay behind, remain, < ὑπό, under, + μένειν, remain: see remain.] Same as hypogenous, 2. Lindley.

hypomeral (hī-pom′ē-ral), a. [< hypomere + -al.] Inferior or lower, as a part of a sponge; ★of or pertaining to a hypomere.

hypomere (hī′pō-mēr), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + μέρος, a part.] That lower part of some sponges which has all three fundamental layers, ectoderm, mesoderm, and endoderm, but develops no flagellated chambers or choanosome: distinguished from spongomere.

The lower half [of a Rhagon], which consists of all three fundamental layers, may be called the hypomere.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

hypomixolydian (hī-pō-mik-sō-lid′i-an), a. [< hypo- + mixolydian.] See under mode.

hyponastic (hī-pō-nas′tik), a. [As hyponasty + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by hyponasty. Darwin.

When the upper surface of the organ [a leaf] is growing the more rapidly the growth is said to be epinastic, when the lower, hyponastic. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 58.

hyponasty (hī′pō-nas-ti), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ναστός, close-pressed, solid, < νάσσειν, press close.] In bot., increased growth along the lower surface of an organ or part of a plant, causing the part to bend upward. Compare epinasty.

hyponeuria (hī-pō-nū′ri-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + νεῦρον, nerve.] In pathol., morbidly diminished nervous energy. Dunglison.

hyponitrite (hī-pō-nī′trit), n. [< hyponitr-ous + *-ite*2.] A salt of hyponitrous acid.

hyponitrous (hī-pō-nī′trus), a. [< hypo- + nitrous.] Used only in the following name:—Hyponitrous acid, a very unstable substance, which is obtained in colorless crystalline leaflets, formula $H_2N_2O_2$.

hyponoia (hī-pō-noi′ą), n. [< Gr. ὑπόνοια, hidden thought, deeper meaning, < ὑπονοεῖν, think secretly, suspect, < ὑπό, under, + νοεῖν, think, < νόος, mind.] In theol., a supposed hidden meaning or double sense underlying the language of the Bible.

hyponome (hī′pō-nōm), n. [< Gr. ὑπονομή, an underground passage, < ὑπόνομος, going underground, < ὑπό, under, + νέμειν, dwell in, inhabit.] The ambulatory pipe or so-called fleshy funnel of a cephalopod. A. Hyatt, Science, III. 123.

hypopharyngeal (hī″pō-fa-rin′jē-ąl), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + φάρυγξ, throat (pharynx).]
I. a. 1. Situated beneath the pharynx.—2. Situated at the lower part of the pharynx.—3. In entom., pertaining to the hypopharynx.—4. In ichth., specifically applied to the lower pharyngeal bones: opposed to epipharyngeal. See the extract.

There are [in osseous fishes] usually five pair of branchial arches connected by median ventral ossifications. The posterior pair are single bones, which underlie the floor of the pharynx, bear no branchial filaments, but commonly support teeth, and are called hypopharyngeal bones. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 136.

Hypopharyngeal band, in ascidians, a ciliated tract continued backward from the peripharyngeal band along the middle of the neural surface of the pharynx to or toward the esophageal opening. See cut under Salpa.—Hypopharyngeal fold, either of a pair of longitudinal lamellæ on the middle line of the branchial sac or pharyngeal cavity of an ascidian.

II. n. One of the lower pharyngeal bones: generally used in the plural.

hypopharynx (hī-pō-far′ingks), n.; pl. hypopharynges (-fa-rin′jēz). [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + φάρυγξ, throat (pharynx).] In entom., a fleshy organ, generally strengthened with chitinous sclerites, projecting from the floor of the mouth at the opening of the pharynx or gullet. It sometimes has a tongue-like prolongation called the lingua, or that name may be given to the whole hypopharynx. See cut under Hymenoptera.

The anterior surface of the lingua and hypopharynx is beset with fine hairs. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 353.

hypophet (hī′pō-fet), n. [< Gr. ὑποφήτης, a suggester, interpreter, < ὑπό, under, + φάναι, speak. Cf. prophet.] An expounder or interpreter. Bunsen. [Rare.]

hypophlœodal (hī-pō-flē′ō-dąl), a. Same as hypophlœodic.

hypophlœodic (hī″pō-flē-od′ik), a. [As hypophlœous + -ode + -ic.] In lichenol., living in the periderm of a plant; situated beneath the outer layers of the bark. Compare epiphlœodic.

hypophlœous (hī-pō-flē′us), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + φλοιός, bark.] Same as hypophlœodic.

hypophora (hī-pof′ō-rą), n. [LL., < Gr. ὑποφορά, a putting under, subjoining, hypophora, < ὑποφέρειν, carry away under, put under, subjoin, < ὑπό, under, + φέρειν = E. *bear*1.] In rhet., the statement of an opponent's objection or of an argument which might be urged against the speaker's or writer's position. The hypophora is followed by the answer or counter-argument, called the anthypophora. Hypophora and anthypophora frequently take the form of a series of questions and answers. The word hypophora has accordingly been used sometimes as equivalent to eperotesis.

hypophosphate (hī-pō-fos′fāt), n. [< hypophosph(orous) + *-ate*1.] A salt formed by the union of hypophosphoric acid with a base.

hypophosphite (hī-pō-fos′fīt), n. [< hypophosph(orous) + *-ite*2.] In chem., a salt obtained by the union of hypophosphorous acid with a salifiable base.

hypophosphoric (hī″pō-fos-for′ik), a. Containing less oxygen than does phosphoric acid.

hypophosphorous (hī-pō-fos′fō-rus), a. [< hypo- + phosphorous.] In chem., containing less oxygen than phosphorous acid contains.—Hypophosphorous acid, H_3PO_2, an acid formed by decomposing phosphides with water. It may be obtained as a syrupy acid liquid or a white crystalline solid. Its salts are used to some extent as medicine.

hypophrygian (hī-pō-frij′i-an), a. [< Gr. ὑποφρύγιος, < ὑπό, under, + Φρύγιος, Phrygian.] See under mode.

Hypophthalma (hī-pof-thal′mą), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] 1. pl. In Latreille's system of classification (1831), the ninth tribe of crabs of the division Heterochelæ, having the hind pair of legs very small and either dorsal or abortive.—2. sing. A genus of arachnids. Taczanowsky, 1873.

hypophyge (hī-pof′i-jē), n. [< Gr. ὑποφυγή, a refuge (a recess), < ὑποφεύγειν, flee from under, retire a little, < ὑπό, under, + φεύγειν, flee.] In arch., a depression of curved profile beneath some feature, as the hollow molding beneath some archaic Doric capitals, as at Pæstum and Selinus; an apophyge; a scotia. See cut under column.

hypophyllium (hī-pō-fil′i-um), n.; pl. hypophyllia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf.] In bot., a small abortive leaf or scale destitute of laminæ, and situated beneath another leaf or cluster of leaf-like branches, as in asparagus. More correctly spelled hypophyllum.

hypophyllous (hī-pō-fil′us), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf, + -ous.] In bot., same as hypogenous, 1.

hypophyses, n. Plural of hypophysis.

hypophysial (hī-pō-fiz′i-ąl), a. Of or pertaining to the hypophysis. See conario-hypophysial.

hypophysical (hī-pō-fiz′i-kąl), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + φυσικός, physical.] Inferior to the physical; beneath or below the physical.

All kinds of knowledge were entirely familiar to him [Jesus]: as the narrative expresses it, the physical and the metaphysical, the hyperphysical and [the] hypophysical.
Stowe, Origin of Books of the Bible, p. 229.

hypophysis (hī-pof′i-sis), n.; pl. hypophyses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. ὑπόφυσις, an undergrowth, a process, < ὑποφύειν, make to grow from below, pass. grow from below, grow up, < ὑπό, under, + φύειν, make to grow, pass. φύεσθαι, grow. Cf. epiphysis.] 1. The pituitary body of the brain, which is lodged in the sella turcica of the sphenoid bone, and attached to the tuber cinereum of the brain by the infundibulum. It occurs in all vertebrates except Amphioxus. It does not appear to be of true nervous tissue, and its function, if any, is unknown. The name is correlated with epiphysis as a name of the conarium. More fully called hypophysis cerebri. See second cut under brain.

2. In bot.: (a) In angiosperms, the layer of cells in the embryo resulting from the successive fission of the penultimate cell of the suspensor, which gives rise to the primary root and root-cap. (b) In mosses, an enlargement of the pedicel at the base of the capsule. Also called, less correctly, apophysis. See cut under Andreæa.

hypopial (hī-pō′pi-ąl), a. [< hypopus + -ial.] Relating to the hypopus stage of certain acaroids. See hypopus, 2.

The hypopial period takes the place of that between two ecdyses in the ordinary life-history.
Michael, Jour. Linn. Soc. (1884), XVII. 389.

hypoplastral (hī-pō-plas′tral), a. Of or pertaining to the hypoplastron of a turtle.

hypoplastron (hī-pō-plas′tron), n.; pl. hypoplastra (-trą). [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + NL. plastron, q. v.] The third lateral piece of the plastron of a turtle: applied by Huxley ("Anat. Vert.," p. 174) to what others call hyposternum. See second cut under Chelonia.

hypopodium (hī-pō-pō′di-um), n.; pl. hypopodia (-ą). [NL. (cf. LL. hypopodium, < Gr. ὑποπόδιον, a foot-stove), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In bot., the stalk or foot of the carpels. Lindley. [Rare.]

hypopselaphesia (hī-pop-sel-ạ-fē′si-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ψηλάφησις, a touching, < ψηλαφᾶν, feel, touch.] In pathol., partial loss of the tactile sense.

hypopterate (hī-pop′tẹ-rāt), a. [< Gr. ὑπόπτερος, winged, < ὑπό, under, + πτερόν, a wing, + -ate[1].] In bot., having a wing produced at the base or below. Lindley. [Rare.]

Hypopterygiaceæ (hī-pop-tẹ-rij-i-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + πτέρυξ, πτερύγιον, a wing, < πτερόν, a wing.] A family of pleurocarpous or lateral-fruited mosses, with a peculiar arrangement of the leaves, which are placed in two opposite straight rows united on the upper side of the stem, with a third median row of smaller stipuliform leaves on the under side. The cells of the leaves are parenchymatous and equal in all parts. It belongs to the classification of C. Müller, who also wrote it Hypopterygei: a classification not generally followed.

hypoptila, n. Plural of hypoptilum.

hypoptilar (hī-pop′ti-lär), a. [< hypoptilum + -ar[2].] Pertaining to the hypoptilum; hyporachidian.

hypoptilum (hī-pop′ti-lum), n.; pl. hypoptila (-lạ). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + πτίλον, feather.] In ornith., the aftershaft or hyporachis of a feather; the whole of the supplementary plume which springs from the stem of the main feather at the junction of calamus and rachis. Hypoptila are usually present in the general plumage of birds, but are wanting in some families, as owls, and are never developed on the remiges or rectrices. They are usually much smaller than the main feather, but in some cases are about as large, when the feather appears to be double, but with a single barrel. See hyporachis and aftershaft, both of which are more frequently used than hypoptilum.

Hypopus (hī′pō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ποῦς = E. foot.] 1. A supposed genus of acaroids. Dugès, 1834. Hence—2. [l. c.] A heteromorphous nymph of certain acaroids, formerly supposed to be a generic type of the acaroids.

The true hypopus is a heteromorphous nymphal form of Tyroglyphus, and possibly of some allied, or other genera. Michael, Jour. Linn. Soc. (1884), XVII. 379.

hypopygia, n. Plural of hypopygium.

hypopygial (hī-pō-pij′i-ạl), a. [< hypopygium + -al.] In entom., situated under the end of the abdomen; specifically, of or pertaining to the hypopygium.—Hypopygial valves, two oval or oblong cleft plates on the lower side of the last abdominal segments, such as are found in many Tenthredinidæ.

hypopygium (hī-pō-pij′i-um), n.; pl. hypopygia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ὑποπύγιον, the rump, < ὑπό, under, + πυγή, the buttocks.] In entom.: (a) The lamellate clasping-organ at the end of the abdomen of many male dipterous insects, designed to retain the female. In some species it is very large, and turned under the abdomen. (b) The last visible ventral segment of an insect's abdomen, immediately beneath the pygidium, or last dorsal segment. Kirby.

hypopyum, hypopyon (hī-pō′pi-um, -on), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπόπνον, a kind of ulcer, neut. of ὑπόπνος, tending to suppuration, < ὑπό, under, + πίον, pus: see pus, pyemia.] In pathol., an effusion of pus into the anterior chamber of the eye, or between the layers of the cornea. [Rarely used.]

hyporachidian (hī″pō-ra-kid′i-ạn), a. [< hyporachis (-id-) + -ian.] Pertaining to or having the character of the hyporachis. Also hyporhachidian.

hyporachis (hī-por′ạ-kis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπόραχις, the hollow above the hip, < ὑπό, under, + ῥάχις, the spine.] In ornith.: (a) Properly, the aftershaft; the rachis accessoria; the stem or scape of the supplementary feather which grows upon many feathers of most birds.

Structural characters no less important separate the Rheas from the Emeus, and, apart from their very different physiognomy, the former can be readily recognized by the rounded form of their contour-feathers, which want the hyporrhachis or after-shaft that in the Emeus and Cassowaries is so long as to equal the main shaft. Encyc. Brit., XX. 505.

(b) The whole of such a supplementary feather; a hypoptilum: more frequently but less correctly used in this sense. See hypoptilum and aftershaft. Also written hyporrhachis.

hyporadial (hī-pō-rā′di-ạl), a. [< hyporadii + -al.] Of or pertaining to the hyporadii.

hyporadii (hī-pō-rā′di-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + L. radius, q. v.] In ornith., the accessory radii or barbs of a feather. The barbs of the hyporachis or hypoptilum are to the supplementary feather what the radii or barbs are to the main feather; they may bear barbules or hyporadioli, but never hamuli or hooklets.

hyporadioli (hī-pō-rā-dī′ō-lī), n. pl. [NL., dim. of hyporadii.] The barbules of the hyporadii; the lesser processes borne upon the barbs of a hyporachis or of a hypoptilum.

hyporchem, n. See hyporcheme.

hyporchema (hī-pôr-kē′mạ), n.; pl. hyporchemata (-mạ-tạ). [NL.] Same as hyporcheme.

hyporchematic (hī″pôr-kē-mat′ik), a. [< hyporchema(t-) + -ic.] Consisting in or pertaining to a hyporcheme or hyporchesis; characterizing or employed in hyporchemes: as, a hyporchematic dance; hyporchematic rhythms.—Hyporchematic prosodiac, in anc. pros., an episynthetic meter, consisting of an anapestic prosodiac and an iambic dimeter catalectic (⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – | ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑).

hyporcheme, hyporchem (hī′pôr-kēm, -kem), n. [< Gr. ὑπόρχημα, < ὑπορχεῖσθαι, dance with or to music, < ὑπό, under, + ὀρχεῖσθαι, dance.] In Gr. antiq. and pros., a hymn or poem sung by the main body of the chorus, while some of their number accompanied it with mimetic dancing and gesticulation. The hyporcheme, like the pæan, was originally a hymn or song in honor of Apollo, but of a less solemn character than the pæan. This kind of composition is said to have been first developed by Thaletas in the seventh century B. C., and we still possess fragments of hyporchemes by Simonides, Pratinas, Bacchylides, and Pindar.

hyporchesis (hī-pôr-kē′sis), n. [< Gr. ὑπόρχησις, a dancing to the hyporcheme: see hyporcheme.] In Gr. antiq., a choric dance with singing, accompanied by some of the chorus with pantomimic action. The poem sung was called a hyporcheme.

hyporrhythmic (hī-pō-rith′mik), a. [< Gr. ὑπόρρυθμος, subrhythmical, < ὑπό, under, + ῥυθμός, rhythm: see rhythm.] Deficient in rhythm: applied to a heroic hexameter in which the end of a foot coincides throughout with the end of a word. Such a line, having as many diereses as there are feet ending within the line, and no true cesura, loses all rhythmic coherence and continuity. An example is:

Spārsīs ‖ hāstīs ‖ lōngīs ‖ cāmpūs ‖ splēndĕt ĕt ‖ hōrrĕt. Ennius.

hyposcenium (hī-pō-sē′ni-um), n.; pl. hyposcenia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ὑποσκήνιον, the wall under the front of the stage, < ὑπό, under, + σκήνη, the stage: see scene.] In the ancient Greek theater, the low wall beneath the logeion or front part of the stage, which was raised upon it above the orchestra or konistra. This wall was frequently ornamented with sculptured reliefs, as in the Dionysiac theater at Athens, or with columns and other architectural features, as in the theater of Epidaurus. A flight of steps in the middle or on either side afforded communication between the stage and the orchestra.

hyposkeletal (hī-pō-skel′e-tạl), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + σκελετόν, skeleton, + -al.] In anat., developed, as muscles, below the endoskeleton: opposed to episkeletal.

The hyposkeletal muscles are separated from the episkeletal, not only by the endoskeleton of the trunk, . . . but by the ventral branches of the spinal nerves. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 44.

hypospadia (hī-pō-spā′di-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποσπαδίος or ὑποσπαδιαῖος, one having hypospadia, < ὑπό, under, + σπᾶν, draw.] An arrest of development of the male generative organs, the urethra being more or less extensively open along its under side. Also hypospadias.

hypospadiac (hī-pō-spā′di-ak), a. and n. [< hypospadia + -ac.] I. a. Pertaining to or characterized by hypospadia.

★ II. n. One who is affected by hypospadia.

hyposphenal (hī-pō-sfē′nạl), a. [< hyposphene + -al.] Of or pertaining to a hyposphene; characterized by or possessing a hyposphene, as a vertebra; articulated by means of a hyposphene: as, a hyposphenal process, vertebra, or articulation. Also rarely diplosphenal.

hyposphene (hī′pō-sfēn), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + σφήν, a wedge.] The median and single wedge-shaped process situated on the neural arch below the postzygapophyses of the vertebræ of certain extinct reptiles of the Permian period: so called by Cope, and later named diplosphene by Marsh. The process projects into the neural canal from the hinder part of the neural arch, and, with a corresponding formation on the fore part of the neural arch of a succeeding vertebra, affords an articulation additional to those made by the zygapophyses proper.

hyposporangium† (hī″pō-spō-ran′ji-um), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + σπορά, a spore or seed, + ἀγγεῖον, a vessel.] The indusium growing from beneath the spore-case of a fern. Cooke. Also called indusium inferior.

hypostasis (hī-pos′tạ-sis), n.; pl. hypostases (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. ὑπόστασις, a supporting, foundation, substance, reality, < ὑπόστατος, substantially existing, lit. set under, < ὑφιστάναι, set under, pass. stand under, < ὑπό, under, + ἱστάναι, set, = L. stare = E. sta-nd.] 1. That which underlies something else; that which forms the basis of something; foundation; support.—2. In theol., a person of the Trinity; one of the three real and distinct subsistences in the one undivided substance or essence of God. The Christian uses of the term hypostasis started from the meaning 'a reality; a real personal subsistence or substance.' In this sense the word could be used of God either as the Trinity or as each person of the Trinity. Accordingly, the meaning of the phrase "character of his [the Father's] hypostasis," in Heb. i. 3, has been variously understood, the authorized version translating it "express image of his person," and the revised version, "the very image [margin, the impress] of his substance," and the general usage of the early church being unsettled down to the time of the Arian controversy. In the Western Church the word person (persona, πρόσωπον) had come into use in the sense still retained by us, and hypostasis, substance, or subsistence (substantia, subsistentia) was used as equivalent to 'essence' (οὐσία). The Greeks objected to persona or πρόσωπον (properly, a mask or dramatic character), as conveying the Patripassian or Sabellian idea of a mere difference of manifestation, and πρόσωπον never became thoroughly adopted as a Greek theological term. At Alexandria, in the third and fourth centuries, on the other hand, hypostasis had come to be generally used in the sense of 'person,' while at Antioch in the middle of the fourth century there were two different parties among the orthodox: the Meletians, who used hypostasis in the sense of 'person,' and the Eustathians, who used it as equivalent to 'substance' or 'essence' (οὐσία). At a council in Alexandria, A. D. 362, under St. Athanasius, it was agreed that both parties were equally orthodox, and held the same doctrine under a different terminology, and after this the use of hypostasis in the sense of 'essence' was gradually abandoned.

That two natures . . . could have been concentred into one hypostasis. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 759.

Essence denotes that which is common to Father, Son, and Spirit. It denominates the substance, or constitutional being, of the Deity, which is possessed alike and differently by each of the personal distinctions. . . . Hypostasis is a term which was more subtle in its meaning than Essence. It denotes not that which is common to the Three in One, but that which is distinctive of and peculiar to them. Shedd, Hist. Christian Doctrine, I. 364.

3. In metaph., a substantial mode by which the existence of a substantial nature is determined to subsist by itself and be incommunicable; subsistence.—4. A hypothetical substance; a phenomenon or state of things spoken and thought of as if it were a substance.

With death the personal activity of which the soul is the popular hypostasis is put into commission among posterity, and the future life is an immortality by deputy (according to Mr. Harrison's theory). Huxley.

5. Principle: a term applied by the alchemists to mercury, sulphur, and salt, in accordance with their doctrine that these were the three principles of all material bodies.—6. In med.: (a) A sediment, as of the urine; any morbid deposition in the body. (b) An overfullness of blood-vessels caused by a dependent position, as of the veins of the legs (varicose veins), etc.; hypostatic congestion.

Also hypostasy.

hypostasization (hī-pos″tạ-si-zā′shọn), n. Same as hypostatization.

hypostasize (hī-pos′tạ-sīz), v. t. [< hypostasis + -ize.] Same as hypostatize.

The hypostasizing of cause as will seems to us only a more refined form of the hypostasizing of particular processes or forces of Nature as persons, to which mythology is largely referable. Westminster Rev., CXXV. 223.

hypostasy (hī-pos′tạ-si), n. [< NL. hypostasis, q. v.] Same as hypostasis.

Wheir as in that vnion the rest is an ineffable mysterie, the two natures in Christ to haue one subsistence called & termed an hypostasie. Bp. Gardiner, Explication, fol. 117.

hypostatic (hī-pō-stat′ik), a. [< Gr. ὑποστατικός, belonging to substance, < ὑπόστατος, substantially existing: see hypostasis.] 1. Relating to hypostasis; constitutive or elementary. The hypostatic principles are salt, sulphur, and mercury. See hypostasis, 5.

Of late, divers learned men, having adopted the three hypostaticall principles, are very inclinable to reduce all qualities or bodies to one or other of those three principles; and particularly assign for the cause of blackness the sooty steam of a dust or torrified sulphur. Boyle, Hist. Colours, Experiment xv.

2. In theol., personal, or distinctly personal; pertaining to or constituting a distinct being or substance. See hypostasis, 2.

Christians who . . . opposed the doctrine of a hypostatic Logos, . . . or of an independent personal subsistence of the Divine Word. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

3. In med., arising from downward pressure; caused by dependence: as, hypostatic congestion.—Hypostatic union, the union of two natures, the divine and the human, in the one hypostasis or person of Christ.

The personal or hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 80.

hypostatical (hī-pō-stat'i-kạl), a. [< hypostatic + -al.] Same as hypostatic.

But the word hypostatical is understood only by those . . . that are learned in the Greek tongue, and is properly used . . . of the union of the two natures of Christ in one person. Hobbes, Ans. to Bp. Bramhall, p. 434.

hypostatically (hī-pō-stat'i-kạl-i), adv. In a hypostatic manner; personally; in actual substance.

The only true and eternal God hypostatically joined with his holy humanity. Jer. Taylor, Liberty of Prophesying, § 20.

hypostatization (hī-pos″tā-ti-zā'shọn), n. [< hypostatize + -ation.] The act of hypostatizing, or the state of being hypostatized. Also hypostasization.

Cousin is correct in pointing out, from the Realistic point of view, that it is one thing to deny the hypostatization of an accident like colour or wisdom, and another thing to deny the foundation in reality of those "true and legitimate universals" which we understand by the terms genera and species. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 421.

hypostatize (hī-pos'tā-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypostatized, ppr. hypostatizing. [< hypostat-ic + -ize.] To attribute substantial existence to; make into or regard as a distinct individual substance or reality. A hypostatized attribute is one which is itself regarded as the subject of attributes or characters; and a hypostatized relation is one treated as having relations to other relations. Also hypostatise, hypostasize.

We then hypostatise the zero; we baptize it with the name of the absolute. Sir W. Hamilton.

If we can hypostatize the community, and treat it as an individual with magnified but human wants and satisfactions, then, for this leviathan, the ethical end will correspond to what is called Utilitarianism or Universalistic Hedonism. W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 43.

hyposterna, n. Plural of hyposternum.

hyposternal (hī-pō-stėr'nạl), a. 1. Situated ★or occurring below the sternum; substernal: as, hyposternal pain.—2. Of or pertaining to the hyposternum or hypoplastron: as, the hyposternal scute of a tortoise. See plastron.

hyposternum (hī-pō-stėr'num), n.; pl. hyposterna (-nạ̈). [NL., < Gr. ὑποστερνον, neut. of ὑπόστερνος, under the breast, < ὑπό, under, + στέρνον, the breast.] The third lateral piece of the plastron of a turtle: called the hypoplastron by Huxley. See second cut under Chelonia.

hypostigma (hī-pō-stig'mạ̈), n.; pl. hypostigmai (-mī). [< Gr. ὑποστιγμή, a comma, < ὑπό, under, + στιγμή, a point: see stigma.] In paleography, a point like the modern period, used with the value of a comma. Also hypostigme.

hypostoma (hī-pos'tō-mạ̈), n.; pl. hypostomata (hī-pō-stō'mạ-tạ̈). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. An inferior part or organ of the mouth of arthropods and some other animals. (a) The clypeus of dipterous insects. (b) The broad curved sclerite behind the lamina labialis of myriapods. Meinert. (c) A median formation below and behind the mouth-parts of some crustaceans, as the Eurypterida. Also called metastoma. (d) The labium or under lip of trilobites. (e) The proboscis of hydrozoans. Hyatt. Also hypostome.

★2. [cap.] Same as Hypostomus.

Hypostomata (hī-pō-stō'mạ-tạ̈), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. An order or suborder of fishes, confined to the eastern seas, alone represented by the family Pegasidæ, of uncertain position, but now supposed to be related to the sticklebacks and sea-horses. Originally written in the French form Hypostomides by Duméril.—2. A group of echinoderms. J. E. Gray, 1840.—3. Infusorians in which the mouth is inferior or ventral. Diesing, 1865.

hypostomatous (hī-pō-stom'ạ-tus), a. [As hypostoma(t-) + -ous.] Having the mouth inferior or ventral, as some infusorians.

hypostome (hī'pō-stōm), n. [< NL. hypostoma, q. v.] Same as hypostoma, 1.

Hypostomidæ (hī-pō-stom'i-dē), n. pl. [< Hypostomus + -idæ.] A family of nematognathous fishes, named from the genus Hypostomus: same as Loricariidæ.

hypostomous (hī-pos'tō-mus), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] In ichth., having the mouth inferior.

Hypostomus (hī-pos'tō-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + στόμα, mouth.] A genus of fishes, in which the mouth is inferior and under the snout, typical of the family Hypostomidæ. Lacépède, 1803. Also Hypostoma.

hypostrophe (hī-pos'trō-fē), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποστροφή, a turning about, recurrence, < ὑποστρέφειν, turn about, return, < ὑπό, under, + στρέφειν, turn: see strophe.] 1†. In med.: (a) The act of a patient in turning himself. (b) Return of a disease; relapse.—2. In rhet., the use of insertion or parenthesis; return to the subject after parenthesis.

hypostyle (hī'pō-stīl), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπόστυλος, resting on pillars set underneath, < ὑπό, under, + στῦλος, a pillar: see style[2].] I. a. In arch., having the roof supported by pillars: as, the hypostyle hall at Karnak.

We come to a hypostyle hall of great beauty, formed by two ranges of larger columns in the centre, and three rows of smaller ones on each side. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 117.

II. n. In arch., a structure, with or without inclosing walls, the ceiling of which is supported by columns; a covered colonnade; a pillared hall: applied specifically to the manyhyposulphite (hī-pō-sul'fīt), n. [< hyposulph-urous + -ite[2].] A salt of hyposulphurous acid (H_2SO_2). Sodium hyposulphite (hyposulphite of soda) is the commercial name for sodium thiosulphate, a salt of thiosulphuric acid ($H_2S_2O_3$), which is used by dyers for reducing indigo, and generally in the arts as a reducing or deoxidizing agent—notably in photography, as the usual chemical for fixing plates and prints.

hyposulphuric (hī″pō-sul-fū'rik), a. Same as dithionic.

hyposulphurous (hī-pō-sul'fėr-us), a. [< hypo- + sulphurous.] Next in a series below sulphurous: used only in the following phrase. —Hyposulphurous acid. (a) An acid, H_2SO_2, differing in composition from sulphurous acid only by having one less oxygen atom in the molecule. (b) A totally distinct acid, $H_2S_2O_3$, now called thiosulphuric acid. See thiosulphuric.

hyposyllogistic (hī-pō-sil-ō-jis'tik), a. [< hypo- + syllogistic.] Concluding necessarily like a syllogism, but not strictly syllogistic.

hyposynaphe (hī-pō-sin'ạ-fē), n. [< Gr. ὑποσυναφή, < ὑποσυνάπτειν, combine slightly, < ὑπό, under, + συνάπτειν, join together, combine, < σύν, along with, + ἅπτειν, join.] In early music, the separation of two tetrachords by a tetrachord conjunct with both, as between the hypaton and the synnemenon. See tetrachord.

hypotactic (hī-pō-tak'tik), a. [< Gr. ὑποτακτικός, subordinate, subjoined, < ὑποτάσσειν, place under, subject: see hypotaxis.] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by hypotaxis; dependent: as, two temporal clauses in hypotactic construction.

hypotarsal (hī-pō-tär'sạl), a. [< hypotarsus + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of the hypotarsus.

hypotarsus (hī-pō-tär'sus), n.; pl. hypotarsi (-sī). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ταρσός, the flat of the foot: see tarsus.] In ornith., the talus or so-called calcaneum; a bony process or ossification at the superior and posterior part of the main tarsometatarsal bone, supposed to answer to distal tarsal elements of the reptilian or mammalian foot. It is usually a prominent feature of the upper end and plantar aspect of a bird's tarsus, and is perforated by canals for the passage of tendons of flexor muscles of the toes. See cut under tarsometatarsus.

hypotaxis (hī-pō-tak'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπόταξις, subjection, submission, < ὑποτάσσειν, place under, subject, < ὑπό, under, + τάσσειν, arrange.] In gram., dependent construction: opposed to parataxis.

Now to make hypotaxis out of parataxis, we must have a joint. B. L. Gildersleeve, Jour. Philol., XVI. 420.

hypotenusal, hypothenusal (hī-pot-, hī-poth-e-nū'sạl), a. [< hypotenuse, hypothenuse, + -al.] Pertaining to a hypotenuse; of the nature of a hypotenuse; forming or formed by a hypotenuse.

Light is incident in such a manner that the angle of internal incidence at the hypotenusal side is nearly equal to the angle of total reflection. Airy, Optics, prop. xvii.

hypotenuse, hypothenuse (hī-pot'-, hī-poth'-e-nūs), n. [Prop. hypotenuse, but the erroneous form hypothenuse is more common; < F. hypoténuse = Sp. hipotenusa = Pg. hypothenusa = It. ipotenusa, < LL. hypotenusa, < Gr. ὑποτείνουσα, or in full ἡ τὴν ὀρθὴν γωνίαν ὑποτείνουσα, πλευρά, the side subtending the right angle, ppr. fem. of ὑποτείνειν, stretch under, subtend, < ὑπό (= L. sub), under, + τείνειν (= L. tendere), stretch: see tend[1], tone[1].] In geom., the side of a right-angled triangle opposite the right angle.

hypothalli, n. Plural of hypothallus.

hypothalline (hī-pō-thal'in), a. [< hypothallus + -ine[1].] Resembling or pertaining to the hypothallus.

hypothallus (hī-pō-thal'us), n.; pl. hypothalli (-ī). [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + θαλλός, a young shoot or branch, a frond.] In lichens, a mass of delicate filaments upon which a thallus is first developed. It is a horizontal stratum, which is developed immediately upon the prothallus, and consists of interlacing filaments or of elongated rounded cellules. It is sometimes of a white or whitish color, but is usually dark or blackish. A secondary form consists of vertical rhizoid fibrillæ, which are usually branching and tufted at the extremities.

hypothec (hī-poth'ek), n. [= D. hypotheek = G. Dan. hypothek = Sw. hypotek, < F. hypothèque = Pr. hypoteca, ypotheca = Sp. hipoteca = Pg. hypotheca = It. ipoteca, < LL. hypotheca, < Gr. ὑποθήκη, a pledge, deposit, mortgage, < ὑποτιθέναι, place under: see hypothesis and theca.] 1. Same as hypothecation, 1.

Possession, Usucaption, Bonitarian ownership, and Hypothek occupy together a prodigious space in the Roman jurisprudence. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 357.

2. In Scots law, a legal lien given to a creditor upon property, to secure the payment of his demand. It usually if not always implies that possession remains with the debtor, and that the creditor has only a right of action. In case of vessels it may be created by agreement. Tacit or legal hypothec exists by implication of law, as in the case of a landlord's lien on crops for rent, and the lien of an attorney or law agent for costs. The term is also applied in a general sense to the preference over other debts against an estate given by law to some demands, such as funeral expenses, wages, etc.

hypothecary (hī-poth'ẹ-kā-ri), a. [< LL. hypothecarius, < hypotheca, a pledge: see hypothec.] Of or pertaining to hypothecation or mortgage: as, a hypothecary note (that is, a note given in acknowledgment of a debt, but which cannot pass into circulation). Also hypothecatory.—Hypothecary action, in civil law, an action to enforce a hypothecation of property by its sale, and the application of the proceeds to pay the debt.—Hypothecary debt, See debt.

hypothecate (hī-poth'ẹ-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. hypothecated, ppr. hypothecating. [< ML. hypothecatus, pp. of hypothecare, hypothecate, < LL. hypotheca, a pledge: see hypothec.] 1. To pledge to a creditor in security for some debt or demand, but without giving the creditor corporeal control; mortgage, leaving the owner in possession.—2. To put in pledge by delivery, as stocks or effects of any kind, as security for a debt or other obligation.

hypothecation (hī-poth-ẹ-kā'shọn), n. [< ML. hypothecatio(n-), < hypothecare, hypothecate: see hypothecate.] 1. In Rom. law, mortgage; a contract lien given by a debtor to his creditor as security, without giving him possession of the property. It usually if not always related to real property, while security upon personal property was given by possession, and termed pignus, or pledge.

The Athenian ἀποτίμηματα, or hypothecations, were open and notorious like our old feoffments. Sir W. Jones, A Commentary on Isæus.

2. In French law (hypothèque), a lien on immovable property for security of a debt, without giving the creditor possession. Legal hypothecation is that which is implied by law; judicial hypothecation, that which is established by a judgment of a court, affecting particular real property or all the real property of a particular debtor; and conventional hypothecation, that which is created by contract before a magistrate or notary. Immobilized shares in the Bank of France are deemed immovable property for the purpose of allowing hypothecation. Vessels may be the subject of conventional hypothecation.

3. In American financial usage, a pledge; a lien on personal property, particularly on negotiable securities, given by a debtor by transferring possession, with evidences of title, to his creditor. In this use the term always implies creation by contract, and that the securities hypothecated are put or supposed to be put beyond the control of the debtor until payment of his debt.

I would give
My laurels, living and to live,
Or as much cash as you could raise on Their value by hypothecation.
Halleck, The Recorder.

4. In modern commercial usage, the mortgage of a vessel or her cargo, as in the phrase hypothecation bond, a bottomry bond or respondentia bond. See bottomry and respondentia.

hypothecator (hī-poth′ē-kā-tọr), n. [< hypothecate + -or.] One who pledges anything as security.

hypothecatory (hī-poth′ē-kā-tō-ri), a. [< hypothecate + -ory.] Same as hypothecary.

hypothecial (hī-pō-thē′si-al), a. [< hypothecium + -al.] Pertaining to the hypothecium.

hypothecium (hī-pō-thē′si-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + θήκη, a case: see theca.] In bot., the layer, usually dense, of hyphal tissue immediately beneath the hymenium.

hypothek, n. See hypothec.

hypothenar (hī-poth′e-när), n. and a. [NL., < Gr. ὑποθέναρ, the part of the palm next the fingers, < ὑπό, under, + θέναρ, the palm of the hand.]

I. n. In anat. and zoöl., the fleshy prominence upon the outer side of the palm of the hand at the base of the little finger. See thenar. Also called hypothenar eminence.

II. a. Pertaining to or situated upon the hypothenar.—Hypothenar muscles, those muscles which collectively act upon the metacarpal bone and the base of the first phalanx of the little finger.

hypothenusal, hypothenuse. See hypotenusal, ★hypotenuse.

hypothesis (hī-poth′e-sis), n.; pl. hypotheses (-sēz). [= D. G. Dan. hypothese = Sw. hypotes = F. hypothèse = Sp. hipótesis = Pg. hypothese = It. ipotesi, < Gr. ὑπόθεσις, a groundwork, foundation, base, supposition, lit. a placing under, that which is placed under, < ὑποτιθέναι, place under, < ὑπό, under, + τιθέναι, place, put, > θέσις, a putting: see thesis. Cf. hypothec.] 1. A condition; that from which something follows: as, freedom is the hypothesis of democracy. [Rarely used in English.]—2. A proposition assumed and taken for granted, to be used as a premise in proving something else; a postulate.

Sooner than abandon his theory, there is no extravagance of hypothesis to which the superstitious man will not resort. Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 385.

When some hypothesis, absurd and vain,
Has filled with all its fumes a critic's brain.
Cowper, Prog. of Err., l. 444.

3. A supposition; a judgment concerning an imaginary state of things, or the imaginary state of things itself concerning whose consequences some statement is made or question is asked; the antecedent of a conditional proposition; the proposition disproved by reductio ad absurdum.

The angles BGH, GHD are equal to two right angles by hypothesis. Playfair's Euclid, I. 28.

4. The conclusion of an argument from consequent and antecedent; a proposition held to be probably true because its consequences, according to known general principles, are found to be true; the supposition that an object has a certain character, from which it would necessarily follow that it must possess other characters which it is observed to possess. The word has always been applied in this sense to theories of the planetary system. Kepler held the hypothesis that Mars moves in an elliptical orbit with the sun in one focus, describing equal areas in equal times, the ellipse having a certain size, shape, and situation, and the perihelion being reached at a certain epoch. Of the three coördinates of the planet's position, two, determining its apparent position, were directly observed, but the third, its varying distance from the earth, was the subject of hypothesis. The hypothesis of Kepler was adopted because it made the apparent places just what they were observed to be. A hypothesis is of the general nature of an inductive conclusion, but it differs from an induction proper in that it involves no generalization, and in that it affords an explanation of observed facts according to known general principles. The distinction between induction and hypothesis is illustrated by the process of deciphering a despatch written in a secret alphabet. A statistical investigation will show that in English writing, in general, the letter e occurs far more frequently than any other; this general proposition is an induction from the particular cases examined. If now the despatch to be deciphered is found to contain 26 characters or less, one of which occurs much more frequently than any of the others, the probable explanation is that each character stands for a letter, and the most frequent one for e: this is hypothesis. At the outset, this is a hypothesis not only in the present sense, but also in that of being a provisional theory insufficiently supported. As the process of deciphering proceeds, however, the inferences become more and more probable, until practical certainty is attained. Still the nature of the evidence remains the same; the conclusion is held true for the sake of the explanation it affords of observed facts. Generally speaking, the conclusions of hypothetic inference cannot be arrived at inductively, because their truth is not susceptible of direct observation in single cases; nor can the conclusions of inductions, on account of their generality, be reached by hypothetic inference. For instance, any historical fact, as that Napoleon Bonaparte once lived, is a hypothesis; for we believe the proposition because its effects—current tradition, the histories, the monuments, etc.—are observed. No mere generalization of observed facts could ever teach us that Napoleon lived. Again, we inductively infer that every particle of matter gravitates toward every other. Hypothesis might lead to this result for any given pair of particles, but never could show that the law is universal. The chief precautions to be used in adopting hypotheses are two: first, we should take pains not to confine our verifications to certain orders of effects to which the supposed fact would give rise, but to examine effects of every kind; secondly, before a hypothesis can be regarded as anything more than a suggestion, it must have produced successful predictions. For example, hypotheses concerning the luminiferous ether have had the defect that they would necessitate certain longitudinal oscillations to which nothing in the phenomena corresponds; and consequently these theories ought not to be held as probably true, but only as analogues of the truth. As long as the kinetical theory of gases merely explained the laws of Boyle and Charles, which it was constructed to explain, it had little importance; but when it was shown that diffusion, viscosity, and conductibility in gases were connected and subject to those laws which theory had predicted, the probability of the hypothesis became very great.

I asked him what he thought of Locusts, and whether the History might not be better accounted for, supposing them to be the winged Creatures that fell so thick about the Camp of Israel? but by his answer it appear'd he had never heard of any such Hypothesis.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 61.

We have explained the phænomena of the heavens and of our sea by the power of gravity. . . . But hitherto I have not been able to discover the cause of those properties of gravity from phænomena, and I frame no hypotheses; for whatever is not deduced from the phænomena is to be called an hypothesis; and hypotheses, whether metaphysical or physical, whether of occult qualities or mechanical, have no place in experimental philosophy.
Newton, Principia (tr. by Motte), iii.

5. An ill-supported theory; a proposition not believed, but whose consequences it is thought desirable to compare with facts.

An hypothesis is any supposition which we make (either without actual evidence, or on evidence avowedly insufficient), in order to endeavor to deduce from it conclusions in accordance with facts which are known to be real; under the idea that if the conclusions to which the hypothesis leads are known truths, the hypothesis either must be, or at least is likely to be true. J. S. Mill.

Documentary, monophyletic, nebular, etc., hypothesis. See the adjectives.—Hypothesis of degeneration. See degeneration.—Syn. Speculation, etc. See theory.

hypothesise, v. i. See hypothesize.

hypothesist (hī-poth′e-sist), n. [< hypothes(is) ★+ -ist.] One who defends a hypothesis.

hypothesize (hī-poth′e-sīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. hypothesized, ppr. hypothesizing. [< hypothes(is) + -ize.] To form hypotheses. Also hypothesise, hypothetize.

One certain proof is, that the Greeks soon lost or entirely neglected it, when they began to hypothesize.
Warburton, Divine Legation, iii. § 4.

We might write and talk and hypothesize, theorize, and reason! Shelley, in Dowden, I. 229.

hypothetic (hī-pō-thet′ik), a. [= F. hypothétique = Sp. hipotético = Pg. hypothetico = It. ipotetico (cf. D. G. hypothetisch = Dan. hypothetisk = Sw. hypotetisk), < LL. hypotheticus, one who proceeds hypothetically, < Gr. ὑποθετικός, supposed, hypothetical, < ὑπόθεσις, hypothesis: see hypothesis.] Founded on or characterized by a hypothesis; supposititious; conjectural.

Essential errors in first principles naturally and necessarily lead to erroneous inferences; and it is in vain that hypothetic notions will be assumed, in order to give the desired consistency to any particular theory.
T. Cogan, Disquisitions, ii. 1.

Hypothetic inference. See inference.—Hypothetic realism or dualism, the metaphysical doctrine that objects external to the consciousness of the subject, though not immediately known, may be inferred to exist from the phenomena of consciousness.

hypothetical (hī-pō-thet′i-kạl), a. and n. [< hypothetic + -al.] I. a. Same as hypothetic, and the more common form.

I may notice by the way that there is a great deal of variation in the language of logicians in regard to the terms conditional and hypothetical. You are aware that conditionalis in Latin is commonly applied as a translation of hypothetikos in Greek; and by Boethius, who was the first among the Latins who elaborated the logical doctrine of hypotheticals, the two terms are used convertibly with each other. By many of the schoolmen, however, the term hypothetical (hypotheticus) was used to denote the genus, and the term conditional to denote the species, and from them this nomenclature has passed into many of the more modern compends of logic—and among others, into those of Aldrich and Whately. This latter usage is wrong. If either term is to be used in subordination to the other, conditional, as the more extensive term, ought to be applied to designate the genus; and so it has accordingly been employed by the best logicians.
Sir W. Hamilton.

The numerical estimates of a large savage population must, of course, be in a great degree hypothetical.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., note.

The great event of Wordsworth's school-days was the death of his father, who left what may be called a hypothetical estate, consisting chiefly of claims upon the first Earl of Lonsdale. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 206.

Destructive hypothetical syllogism, a reasoning in this form: If A is, B is; but B is not, therefore A is not.—Hypothetical argument. See argument.—Hypothetical baptism. Same as conditional baptism (which see, under baptism).—Hypothetical period, in gram., a sentence expressing a condition and conclusion, or composed of a protasis and an apodosis.—Hypothetical proposition, in logic: (a) A proposition consisting of an antecedent and a consequent clause; one which states that two facts are in the relation of reason and consequent; one which excludes an event from the universe of possibility. (b) A proposition consisting of two or more clauses united by conjunctions, or which states a relation to exist between different possibilities.—Hypothetical question, a form of question allowed by the modern law of evidence for the purpose of calling out the opinion of an expert witness, such facts as the interrogating counsel claims he has already proved being stated as a hypothesis, and the witness being requested to state to the jury what his opinion is, supposing or assuming such facts to be true.—Hypothetical syllogism, a syllogism in which one of the premises is a hypothetical proposition. The following is an example of the form of inference which is usually considered as the direct hypothetical syllogism: If it lightens, it will thunder; it does lighten; hence, it will thunder. But some logicians refuse the name of syllogism to this inference, and consider the simplest type of hypothetical syllogism to be: If it lightens, it will thunder; if it rains, it will lighten; hence, if it rains, it will thunder.

II. n. A hypothetical proposition.

Universal abstract judgments and hypotheticals, on the other hand, appear to assert merely necessary connexion of ideal content, and therefore point only to that in the real which is the ground of the consequence necessarily following. Mind, IX. 128.

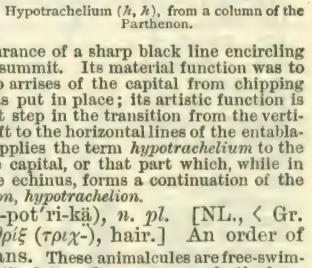
hypothetically (hī-pō-thet′i-kạl-i), adv. In a hypothetical manner or relation; conjecturally.



Whenever anatomical investigation shows the combined action of several distinct fibres, the resulting sensation may, hypothetically, be regarded as composite.
J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 59.

hypothetico-disjunctive (hī-pō-thet″i-kō-dis-jungk′tiv), a. Combining the characters of the hypothetic and disjunctive forms of proposition.—Hypothetico-disjunctive proposition, a hypothetical proposition with a disjunctive consequent.

hypothetist (hī-poth′e-tist), n. [< hypothet(ic) + -ist.] Same as hypothesist.

hypothetize (hī-poth′e-tīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. hypothetized, ppr. hypothetizing. [< hypothet(ic) + -ize.] Same as hypothesize.

hypotrachelium (hī″pō-trā-kē′li-um), n.; pl. hypotrachelia (-ạ). [< L. hypotrachelium, in arch., < Gr. ὑποτραχήλιον, the lower part of the neck, the neck of a column, < ὑποτράχηλος, under the neck, < ὑπό, under, + τράχηλος, the neck.] In arch., in the Doric order, the junction of the capital and the shaft, marked by a bevel or cut around the lower edge of the capital block. The channeling is carried across the hypotrachelium, upon the capital, as far as the annulets. The hypotrachelium has the appearance of a sharp black line encircling the shaft near its summit. Its material function was to preserve the sharp arrises of the capital from chipping when the block was put in place; its artistic function is to serve as the first step in the transition from the vertical lines of the shaft to the horizontal lines of the entablature. Vitruvius applies the term hypotrachelium to the entire neck of the capital, or that part which, while in one block with the echinus, forms a continuation of the shaft. Also incision, hypotrachelion.

Hypotrachelium (h, h), from a column of the Parthenon.

Hypotricha (hī-pot′ri-kạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair.] An order of ciliate infusorians. These animalcules are free-swimming, and are mostly flattened or compressed; the locomotive cilia are confined to the inferior or ventral surface, and often variously modified; the superior or dorsal surface is usually smooth or glabrous, but occasionally bears a few scattered or longitudinal rows of immotile setose cilia; the oral and anal apertures are conspicuously developed, and ventrally located; and trichocysts are rarely developed. The order was founded by Stein, and is contrasted with Heterotricha, Holotricha, and Peritricha. It contains about 6 families and 40 genera.

hypotrichous (hī-pot′ri-kus), a. [As Hypotricha + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to the Hypotricha, or to one of them.—2. Having locomotory cilia confined to the under side of the body: specifically said of the Hypotricha.

hypotrichously (hī-pot′ri-kus-li), adv. So as to be ciliate underneath. S. Kent.

Hypotriorchis (hī-pot-ri-ôr'kis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποτριόρχης, a kind of broad-winged hawk, < ὑπό, under, + τριόρχης, a kind of hawk, prob. the buzzard, < τριόρχης, with three testicles, < τρεῖς (τρι-), = E. three, + ὄρχις, a testicle.] A genus of true falcons, of the subfamily Falconinæ, of small size, represented by such species as the European hobby (H. subbuteo) and merlin (H. æsalon), and the American pigeon-hawk (H. columbarius): now commonly rated as a subgenus of Falco. Boie, 1826.

hypotrochoid (hī-pot'rō-koid), n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + E. trochoid.] A curve which can be traced by a point rigidly connected with a circle which rolls upon the interior of another circle.

This curve [one described by a gyroscopic pendulum] . . . is a species of hypotrochoid. Encyc. Brit., XI. 353.

hypotympanic (hī″pō-tim-pan'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + τύμπανον, a kettledrum: see tympanum.] I. a. Situated beneath the tympanum: as, the hypotympanic bone.

II. n. The so-called tympanic bone, as of birds and reptiles, commonly called the quadrate or os quadratum, which in many vertebrates below mammals forms the suspensorium of the lower jaw. Correlated with epitympanic. See quadrate, n. See cuts at Crotalus and Gallinæ.

hypotypic (hī-pō-tip'ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + τύπος, type.] Subtypical; not quite typical: opposed to hypertypic.

hypotypical (hī-pō-tip'i-kal), a. [< hypotypic + -al.] Same as hypotypic.

hypotyposis (hī″pō-ti-pō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποτύπωσις, a sketch, outline, < ὑποτυποῦν, form slightly, sketch out, < ὑπό, under, + τύπος, impression, type.] 1. In rhet., vivid description of a scene or an event, as though it were present before the eyes of the audience; an oratorical word-picture.—2. A sketch or outline of a science.—The Hypotyposes, the title of the exposition of the Pyrrhonian philosophy by Sextus Empiricus.

hypoxanthic (hī-pok-san'thik), a. [< hypoxanth(ine) + -ic.] Derived from or having the character of hypoxanthine.

hypoxanthine (hī-pok-san'thin), n. [< Gr. ὑπόξανθος, yellowish- or lightish-brown (< ὑπό, under, + ξανθός, yellow), + *-ine*².] A substance ($C_5H_4N_4O$) found in the muscles, liver, spleen, and other organs, which crystallizes in needles and forms compounds with both acids and bases. It is also produced during the putrefaction of proteids. Also called sarcine.

hypoxid (hī-pok'sid), n. [< Hypoxis (-id-).] A plant of the order Hypoxidaceæ. Lindley.

Hypoxidaceæ (hī-pok-si-dā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypoxis (-id-) + -aceæ.] A former family of plants, the genera of which are now referred to the family Amaryllidaceæ and tribe Hypoxideæ.

Hypoxideæ (hī-pok-sid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Robert Brown), < Hypoxis (-id-) + -eæ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants, of the family Amaryllidaceæ, typified by the genus Hypoxis. The rhizome is tuberous or small; the leaves are radical (rarely a few on the stem); and the flowers are solitary on the scape, or sometimes spiked or racemose, rarely umbellate.

Hypoxis (hī-pok'sis), n. [NL. (Linnæus, prop. Hypoxys, so called because the pod is acute at the base), < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ὀξύς, sharp.] A genus of plants of the family Amaryllidaceæ, and the type of the tribe Hypoxideæ. The perianth is 6-parted, and without a tube; the 3 outer segments of the perianth are slightly herbaceous outside; the stamens are 6 in number, and inserted upon a disk surrounding the ovary, which is 3-celled; and the capsule opens by a lid. They are herbaceous plants with mostly narrow, sometimes grass-like leaves, and single or racemose pretty flowers. About 50 species are known, widely distributed, but found mostly in the tropics. H. hirsuta, the star-grass, is a yellow-flowered species, a native of the United States. H. decumbens, of tropical America, is called star-of-Bethlehem.

Hypoxis hirsuta. a, flower; b, stamen; c, fruit; d, same, cut transversely.

Hypoxylon (hī-pok'si-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ξύλον, wood.] A large genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, having the stroma corky or brittle, the perithecia immersed, and the sporidia ovate or lanceolate, simple, and dark-colored. They grow on trees, decaying wood, dead branches, etc. The species are numerous and widely distributed in temperate and subtropical regions.

hypoxylous (hī-pok'si-lus), a. [< Hypoxylon.] Of or pertaining to the genus Hypoxylon.

hypozeuxis (hī-pō-zūk'sis), n. [LL., < Gr. ὑποζευξις, a subduing, a subordinate connection, < ὑποζευγνύναι, yoke under, subject, < ὑπό, under, + ζευγνύναι, yoke: see zeugma.] In gram. and rhet., a figure or construction in which, in a succession of clauses, each subject has its own verb: as, "The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand for ever," Isa. xl. 8. The following is another example:

On the slope
The sword rose, the hind fell, the herd was driven,
Fire glimpsed. Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

If this supplie be made to sundrie clauses, or to one clause sundrie times iterated, and by seuerall words, so as euery clause hath his owne supplie, then it is called by the Greekes Hypozeuxis; we call him the substitute.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 138.

Hypozoa (hī-pō-zō'ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + ζῷον, an animal.] In zoöl., same as Protozoa.

hypozoan (hī-pō-zō'ạn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hypozoa; protozoan.

II. n. One of the Hypozoa; a protozoan.

hypozoic[1] (hī-pō-zō'ik), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + ζωή, life.] In geol., below the limit of life.

hypozoic[2] (hī-pō-zō'ik), a. [< Hypozoa + -ic.] In zoöl., pertaining to the Hypozoa; hypozoan; protozoan.

hypped, hyppish. See *hipped*², hippish.

Hypsibates (hip-sib'ạ-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. as if ὑψιβάτης*, going aloft; cf. ὑψίβατος, set on high, < ὕψι, on high (see hypsosis), + βατός, verbal adj. of βαίνειν, go, = E. come.] 1. A genus of very long-legged grallatorial birds; the stilts. Also called Himantopus. Nitzsch, 1829.—2. A genus of reptiles. Originally written Hypsibatus.

Hypsibrachycephali (hip-si-brak-i-sef'ạ-lī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὑψι, on high, aloft (ὕψος, height), + βραχύς, short, + κεφαλή, head.] In ethnol., those races of men that are characterized by high broad skulls; persons characterized by high and broad skulls.

hypsibrachycephalic (hip-si-brak″i-se-fal'ik or -sef'ạ-lik), a. Having the characters of the Hypsibrachycephali.

hypsibrachycephalism (hip-si-brak-i-sef'ạ-lizm), n. [As hypsibrachycephal-ic + -ism.] In ethnol., the presence or prevalence of high broad skulls.

hypsicephalic (hip″si-se-fal'ik or -sef'ạ-lik), a. [< Gr. ὑψι, on high, + κεφαλή, head.] High, as a skull; exhibiting hypsicephaly.

hypsicephaly (hip-si-sef'ạ-li), n. [As hypsicephal-ic + -y.] The character of a skull the cranial index of which is over 75. See craniometry.

hypsiloid (hip'si-loid), a. [< Gr. ὑψιλοειδής, shaped like upsilon, < ὑ ψιλόν, upsilon, + εἶδος, form.] Shaped like the Greek letter upsilon; curved or arched like U.

The palatal index of the male . . . is exceptionally low, viz. 1038, the general form of the palate being remarkably hypsiloid. Anthropological Jour., XVIII. 9.

Hypsilophodon (hip-si-lof'ọ-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψι, on high, + λόφος, crest, ridge, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A remarkable genus of fossil Mesozoic dinosaurs, of the family Iguanodontidæ, found in the Wealden formation of the Isle of Wight, and exhibiting to a high degree the characteristics of birds, especially in the beak and hind limbs. The ends of the premaxillæ appear to have been toothless and beak-like, and the mandibular symphysis is excavated to receive them, almost as in a parrot; the ischia are very long and slender, with a median ventral symphysis; the pubic bones are as long and slender as in a typical bird, and directed downward and backward, parallel with the ischia, leaving only a very narrow lengthened obturator foramen divided by the obturator process.

hypsilophodont (hip-si-lof'ọ-dont), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the genus Hypsilophodon.

It remains to be seen how far the hypsilophodont modification extended among the Ornithoscelida.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 225.

Hypsilophodontidæ (hip-si-lof-ọ-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypsilophodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of dinosaurs with four functional digits in the hind feet, typified by the genus Hypsilophodon: now included in the Iguanodontidæ.

Hypsiprymninæ (hip″si-prim-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hypsiprymnus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Macropodidæ, typified by the genus Hypsiprymnus; the kangaroo-rats, potoroos, or bettongs. It contains small marsupials, about as large as a rabbit, differing considerably from the true kangaroos in anatomical characters, as well as in general appearance and habits. They feed much on roots, which they dig up by means of their fore feet, the three middle digits of which are elongate. Besides Hypsiprymnus, the group includes such genera as Æpyprymnus and Bettongia.

hypsiprymnine (hip-si-prim'nin), a. Same as hypsiprymnoid.

hypsiprymnoid (hip-si-prim'noid), a. [< Hypsiprymnus + -oid.] Resembling a kangaroo-rat; having the characters of the Hypsiprymninæ.

As to the Didelphia, if we may trust the evidence which seems to be afforded by their very scanty remains, a true Hypsiprymnoid form existed at the epoch of the Trias, contemporaneously with a Carnivorous form.
Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 199.

Hypsiprymnus (hip-si-prim'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψίπρυμνος, with high stern, < ὑψι, on high, aloft, + πρύμνα, the stern of a ship, prop. adj. (sc. ναῦς, ship), the hindmost, fem. of πρυμνός, hindmost, endmost.] The typical genus of Hypsiprymninæ, including the true kangaroo-rats or potoroos, such as H. murinus of New South Wales, with a long scaly tail like a rat's, produced snout, and long coarse pelage. See cut under kangaroo-rat.

Hypsistarian (hip-sis-tā'ri-ạn), n. [< Gr. Ὑψιστάριοι, pl., a Christian sect that distinguished between ὁ ὕψιστος θεός, the Most High God, and ὁ πατήρ, the Father; < ὑψιστος, highest, most high, superl. adj., < ὑψι, adv., on high, aloft.] One of a monotheistic sect in the fourth century, whose doctrines combined pagan, Jewish, and Christian ideas. They were perhaps successors of the Sabæans, but worshiped God only under the name of the Most High, and regarded fire and light as his special symbols. They were found chiefly in Cappadocia.

Hypsodon (hip'sọ-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑψι, on high, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. A genus of fossil fishes of large size, once considered to be related to the pikes, with long, pointed, and erect teeth. The remains occur in the Cretaceous formation of England. Agassiz.—2. [l. c.] A fish of the genus Hypsodon.

hypsodont (hip'sọ-dont), a. [< Gr. ὑψι, on high, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] Having lengthened crowns and short roots, the neck remaining long below the alveolar border of the socket: applied to such teeth as the molars of Bovidæ, in distinction from the brachyodont dentition of Cervidæ. See brachyodont. [The epithet has no reference to the ichthyic genus Hypsodon.]

Modification of [the selenodont form] from a brachyodont to a hypsodont type.
W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 429.

hypsography (hip-sog'rạ-fi), n. [< Gr. ὑψι, on high, aloft, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write, describe.] See the extract.

Eidography, . . . a word suggested as useful in discussing surveys, and having reference solely to the surface form of the earth, its ups and downs, its hills and hollows. The words hypsography and "topography" are each used for this purpose; but the first refers rather to elevation than to form, and "topography" has been and is used in different senses, hence its meaning is uncertain until defined by the writer using it. Science, XII. 280.

hypsometer (hip-som'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑψι, on high, aloft, + μέτρον, a measure.] A thermometrical barometer for measuring altitudes. It consists essentially of a delicate thermometer, with which the temperature of the boiling-point of water at the given height is determined.

hypsometric (hip-sọ-met'rik), a. [< hypsometer + -ic.] Of or pertaining to hypsometry.

The accuracy of the barometer as a hypsometric instrument may be very considerably increased.
J. D. Whitney, Barometric Hypsometry, Pref.

hypsometrical (hip-sọ-met'ri-kal), a. [< hypsometric + -al.] Same as hypsometric: as, hypsometrical maps, which exhibit the heights of mountains, etc.

hypsometrically (hip-sọ-met'ri-kal-i), adv. According to the rules and principles of hypsometry.

hypsometry (hip-som'e-tri), n. [As hypsometer + -y.] The art of measuring the heights of places upon the surface of the earth, either by leveling, by the barometer, by the thermometer, by trigonometrical observations, or otherwise

The many curious and instructive results which a rather extensive examination of the literature of hypsometry since the beginning of the present century has brought to light.
J. D. Whitney, Barometric Hypsometry, p. 25.

hypsophyl, hypsophyll (hip′sō-fil), n. [< Gr. ὑψι, on high, + φύλλον, a leaf.] The involucral leaves, bracts and bracteoles, glumes and paleæ of flowers: a word introduced by Henfrey as a translation of the German Hochblatt. Compare cataphyllum, euphyllum.

hypsophyllary (hip-sof′i-lā-ri), a. [< hypsophyl + -ary.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of hypsophyl.

hypsosis (hip-sō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕψωσις, a lifting high, elevation, < ὑψοῦν, lift high, < ὑψι, on high, aloft, ὑψοῦ, on high (ὕψος, height), prob. connected with ὑπέρ, over, above: see hyper-.] In the Gr. Ch.: (a) The elevation of the eucharist. (b) The elevation of the panagia. (c) [cap.] The Exaltation of the Cross; Holy-Cross day (September 14th).

hypt, p. a. See hipped[2].

Hyptideæ (hip-tid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836–40), < Hyptis (-id-) + -eæ.] A subtribe of labiate plants, typified by the genus Hyptis, belonging to the tribe Ocimeæ. Also written Hyptidæ, Hyptidinæ.

Hyptis (hip′tis), n. [NL. (Jacquin, 1786), so called because the limb of the corolla is turned back; irreg. < Gr. ὑπτιος, laid back, supine, < ὑπό, under.] A very large genus of labiate plants, of the tribe Ocimeæ. The calyx is ovoid-campanulate, with 5 very acute teeth; the corolla is about as long as the calyx; and the upper lip has 4 entire lobes, the lower lip 1, undivided. They are herbs or shrubs of polymorphous habit. Three hundred species are known, nearly all natives of tropical America, chiefly of Brazil. H. suaveolens is called spikenard.

Hypudæus (hip-ū-dē′us), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑποδαίος, underground, subterranean, < ὑπό, under, + οὖδας, poet., the ground.] A notable genus of voles or field-mice, of the subfamily Arvicolinæ. The word is used in various senses: (a) As proposed by Illiger (1811), a synonym of Arvicola (Lacépède), and therefore nearly equivalent to the Arvicolinæ collectively. (b) As restricted by Keyserling and Blasius (1842), and by Baird (1857), a synonym of Evotomys (Coues, 1874), ★the type being Mus rutilus of Pallas. See Evotomys.

hypural (hī-pū′ral), a. [< Gr. ὑπό, under, + οὐρά, tail.] Situated beneath or on the under side of the tail: specifically applied in ichthyology to bones beneath the axis of the tail, supporting fin-rays.

Termination of Spinal Column of Salmon, with many expanded hypural bones.

In most osseous fishes the hypural bones which support the fin-rays of the inferior division [of the tail] become much expanded, and either remain separate, or coalesce into a wedge-shaped, nearly symmetrical bone.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 21.

hyrt, pron. See he[1].

Hyraces (hī′rā-sēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Hyrax.] Same as Hyracoidea. Wagler, 1830.

hyraceum, hyracium (hī-rā′sē-um, -si-um), n. [NL., < Hyrax (-ac-), q. v.] A product of commercial value derived from the hyrax, and imported from the Cape of Good Hope as a substitute for castoreum.

hyracid (hī-ras′id), n. A mammal of the family Hyracidæ; a hyrax.

Hyracidæ (hī-ras′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyrax (-ac-) + -idæ.] The name formerly applied to the then only known family of the order Hyracoidea: now replaced by Procaviidæ, since the name Hyrax is antedated by Procavia.

hyraciform (hī-ras′i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Hyrax (-ac-) + L. forma, shape.] Same as hyracoid.

Hyracina (hī-rā-sī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Hyrax (-ac-) + -ina.] Same as Hyracoidea. C. L. Bonaparte, 1831.

hyracium, n. See hyraceum.

Hyracodon (hī-rak′ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑραξ, shrew-mouse, hyrax, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of primitive rhinoceros-like perissodactyls from the Lower Miocene of North America, type of the family Hyracodontidæ. They had 44 teeth, and only 3 digits on each foot. It is sometimes referred to the Rhinocerotidæ.

hyracodont (hī-rak′ō-dont), a. [< Hyracodon(t-).] Having the form of dentition characteristic of Hyracodon, Hyrax, and Rhinoceros, in which the under molars have the external tubercles crescentic in section, longitudinally compressed, and continuous with the corresponding internal tubercles.

Hyracodontidæ (hī-rak-ō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hyracodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of fossil rhinoceros-like perissodactyls, established for the reception of the genus Hyracodon.

hyracoid (hī′rā-koid), a. [< NL. Hyrax (-ac-) + -oid.] Resembling a hyrax; pertaining to the Hyracoidea, or having their characters. ★Also hyraciform.

Hyracoidea (hī-rā-koi′dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Hyrax (-ac-) + -oidea.] An order of monodelphian mammals, represented by the single family Hyracidæ; the hyraxes. It combines in its dentition characters of perissodactyl hoofed quadrupeds with others of rodents, the molars being like those of the rhinoceros in pattern, while the upper incisors are long, curved, and grow from persistent pulps as in the rodents. The dental formula is: 2 incisors in each half-jaw above and below, no canines, and 4 premolars and 3 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw — in all, 36. There are no clavicles. The fore feet are 4-toed, and the hind feet 3-toed; both are padded underneath, as in carnivores and rodents, not hoofed, as in ungulates; the digits end in stout flat nails. This remarkable order of mammals is of a very generalized type, combining characters of the ungulates on the one hand and of the rodents and insectivores on the other. The animals are of about the size of rabbits, and their general appearance is suggestive of these rodents; they are known as rock-rabbits, and by other names, and the order is also called Gliriformia and Lamnunguia. See Hyracidæ, Hyrax, and ★Hyracoidea. Also called Hyraces and Hyracina.

hyracotherian (hī″rā-kō-thē′ri-an), a. [< Hyracotherium + -an.] Pertaining or related to Hyracotherium.

hyracotheriine (hī″rā-kō-thē′ri-in), a. [< Hyracotherium + -ine[1].] Same as hyracotherian.

Hyracotherium (hī″rā-kō-thē′ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑραξ (ὑρακ-), a shrew-mouse, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil perissodactyls of the tapiroid section, referred to the family Lophiodontidæ. Their dental formula is: 2 incisors above and 3 below on each side, and 1 canine, 4 premolars, and 3 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw — in all, 42. The genus was based upon the skull of an animal of the size of a rabbit, from the London clay. The generic term, as used by De Blainville (1844), has been definitely located in the Lophiodontidæ, and identified with Pachynolophus of Pomel (1847).

Hyrax (hī′raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑραξ, a mouse, shrew-mouse, = L. sorex, shrew-mouse: see Sorex.] 1. The typical genus of the family Hyracidæ and order Hyracoidea, having the molar teeth like those of a rhinoceros in pattern, the lower incisors only slightly notched, the upper incisors approximated, and the upper lip cleft. It has 7 cervical, 22 dorsal, 8 lumbar, 5 sacral, and 6 caudal vertebræ. The genus contains the terrestrial and saxicoline species of Africa and Syria, as H.

Daman (Hyrax syriacus).

capensis, H. habessinicus, H. syriacus, variously known as conies, etc. The name is antedated by Procavia and this is used for existing species.

2. [l. c.] An animal of the genus Hyrax.

Hyrcanian (hėr-kā′ni-an), a. Of or pertaining to the ancient Hyrcania in Asia. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2, 428.

hyre[1]†, v. t. See hire[1].

hyre[2]†, pron. See he[1].

hyrnet†, n. See hern[1].

hyrse (hėrs), n. See hirse.

hyrst, n. See hurst.

hyson (hī′sn), n. [< Chinese hi ch'ün, lit. blooming spring, i. e., first crop.] A China green tea made from the early pluckings. See hyson ★tea. —Hyson skin, a tea consisting of the uncurled broken or coarser leaves of hyson material, of a quality depending upon that from which it was separated.

hy-spy (hī′spī), n. See I-spy.

hyssop (his′up), n. [Formerly hissop, hisop; earlier without the aspirate, ME. isopp, ysope, < AS. ysope = D. hijzop = MLG. isop = MHG. isōpe, isōp, ispe, G. isop, ysopp = Sw. Dan. isop = OF. ysope, hyssope, hyssope, F. hysope = Sp. hisopo = Pg. hysopo, hyssopo = It. isopo, issopo, < L. hysopum, hyssopum, hyssopus, ML. also ysopus, < Gr. ὕσσωπος, ὕσσωπον, an aromatic plant, < Heb. ēzōph, an aromatic plant, different from the mod. hyssop, which is not found in Syria or Egypt.] 1. A small bushy herb of the genus Hyssopus, family Menthaceæ. H. officinalis, common in gardens, is aromatic and stimulating, and was formerly used as an expectorant. Decoctions of the leaves are used externally in bruises and indolent swellings. See Hyssopus.

Hyssop (Hyssopus officinalis). a, flower; b, fruit.

2. In Scrip., a plant the twigs of which were used for sprinkling in the ceremony of purification. It is supposed by some to have been the caper-bush, Capparis spinosa, and by others a plant or several plants growing in Palestine and allied with the European hyssop.

He [Solomon] spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall.
1 Ki. iv. 33.

He took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people.
Heb. ix. 19.

He passed the grave, to throw a handful of earth into it, and sprinkle it with hyssop.
Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 8.

3. Eccles., same as aspersorium, 1. See quotation from Prescott under aspersion, 1. —Solomon's hyssop, thought by some to be a minute moss, Gymnostomum truncatulum; by others identified with the caper-bush, Capparis spinosa. —Wild hyssop, Verbena hastata.

Hyssopideæ (his-ō-pid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Hyssopus (-id-) + -eæ.] A former subtribe of plants, containing the single genus Hyssopus, belonging to the family Menthaceæ; the subtribe Hyssopinæ, in the system of Engler and Prantl.

Hyssopus (hi-sō′pus), n. [L.: see hyssop.] A monotypic genus of plants of the family Menthaceæ, tribe Saturejeæ. The calyx is tubular, 15-nerved, equally 5-toothed, and naked in the throat; the corolla equals the calyx, and has two lips; the stamens are 4 in number, exserted and diverging; and the nutlets are ovoid. It is a perennial herb with wand-like simple branches, lanceolate or linear entire leaves, and blue-purple flowers in small clusters crowded in a spike. H. officinalis, the only species, originally from the Mediterranean region and middle Asia, but now widely cultivated and naturalized, is the hyssop of the gardens.

hystatite (his′tā-tīt), n. [After the orig. G. hystatisches eisenerz (Breithaupt); formation not obvious.] A variety of ilmenite or titanic iron.

hysteralgia (his-tę-ral′ji-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑστεραλγής, causing pains in the uterus, < ὑστέρα, the uterus, + ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., neuralgia of the uterus.

hysteralgic (his-tę-ral′jik), a. [< hysteralgia + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or affected with hysteralgia.

hysteranthous (his-tę-ran′thus), a. [< Gr. ὑστερος, later, after (see hysteresis), + ἄνθος, a flower.] In bot., putting forth leaves after the appearance of the flowers: as, the willows, pop-★lars, etc., are hysteranthous plants.

hysterectomy (his-tę-rek′tō-mi), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + ἐκτομή, a cutting out, < ἐκ, out, + τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., the ex-★cision of the uterus.

hysteresis (his-tę-rē′sis), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρησις, a coming short, deficiency, < ὑστερεῖν, be behind or later, come short, < ὕστερος, later, latter, coming after, behind, second (= AS. ūttera, E. utter, outer), compar. (with superl. ὕστατος), from a base vó* (= Skt. ud = AS. ūt, E. out): see out.] A lagging of one of two related phenomena behind the other. The changes in the thermo-electric and magnetic quality of stretched iron wire, due to cyclical variations in the stress to which it is subjected, lag behind the changes in stress, and this lagging is called hysteresis. The word is applied also to other physical phenomena of a similar character.

hysteria (his-tē′ri-ä), n. [< NL. hysteria, < Gr. ὑστέρα, the womb, uterus (= L. ūterus, for udterus* (?), m., the womb, = Skt. udara, neut., the belly), prob. fem. to ὕστερος, latter (lower): see hysteresis and uterus.] A peculiar psychical state in which there is a mental dissociation of ideas and functions, with a tendency to a splitting of consciousness, or a hypnoid condition. The symptoms (anæsthesia, hyperæsthesia, paralysis, convulsions, vasomotor derangements, etc.) are such as can be produced by autosuggestion or suggestion from without. According to the Freudian theory, hysteria is due to a repressed complex, the mental affect being converted into a somatic manifestation. Also called hysterics: as, to ★have a fit of hysterics.

hysteric (his-ter′ik), a. and n. [= F. hystérique = Sp. histérico = Pg. hysterico = It. isterico (cf.

D. G. hysterisch = Dan. Sw. hysterisk), < L. hystericus, < Gr. ὑστερικός, suffering in the uterus, hysterical, < ὑστέρα, the uterus: see hysteria.] I. a. 1. Relating to, resulting from, affected with, or subject to hysteria.

> Parent of vapours, and of female wit,
> Who give th' hysteric or poetic fit.
> Pope, R. of the L., iv. 60.

2. Having the characteristics of hysteria; emotionally disordered; fitful; frantic.

> With no hysteric weakness or feverish excitement, they preserved their peace and patience. Bancroft.

Hysteric aura. See aura[1].

II. n. A fit of hysteria: commonly in the plural.

> The marquis sank down in his chair in a sort of hysteric. Bulwer, Pelham, lxv.
>
> A love of freedom rarely felt,
> Of freedom in her regal seat
> Of England; not the schoolboy heat,
> The blind hysterics of the Celt.
> Tennyson, In Memoriam, cix.

★ hysterical (his-ter'i-kal), a. [< hysteric + -al.] Same as hysteric, and the more common form.

> With all his great talents, and all his long experience of the world, he had no more self-command than a petted child or a hysterical woman. Macaulay, Frederic the Great.
>
> The last hysterical struggle of rhyme to maintain its place in tragedy. Swinburne, Shakespeare, p. 41.

hysterically (his-ter'i-kal-i), adv. In a hysterical manner; spasmodically.

hysteriform (his-ter'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. hysteria, hysteria (in 2d sense < NL. Hysterium), + L. forma, form.] 1. Resembling or having the character of hysteria.—2. In bot., having the form or appearance of fungi of the genus Hysterium.

Hysterineæ (his-tę-rin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hysterium + -in- + -eæ.] A family of ascomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Hysterium.

hysteritis (his-tę-rī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + -ῖτις.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus; metritis.

Hysterium (his-tē'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑστερος, later: see hysteresis.] A large genus of ascomycetous fungi, having the perithecium labiate, the border entire, and the asci clavate or cylindrical and brown, two or more septate. They grow on decayed wood, branches, etc.

hysterocele (his'tę-rō-sēl), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + κήλη, tumor.] A form of hernia involving the uterus.

hysterodynia (his″tę-rō-din'i-ä), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + ὀδύνη, pain.] Pain of the womb.

hystero-epilepsy (his″tę-rō-ep'i-lep-si), n. In pathol., a form of convulsive attack which presents a greater amount of coördination than ordinary epilepsy, and in this respect resembles a hysterical attack. Also called hysteroid convulsion.

★ hystero-epileptic (his″tę-rō-ep-i-lep'tik), a. Having the character of hysteria and of epilepsy; hysterically epileptiform.

hysterogenic (his″tę-rō-jen'ik), a. [< hysterogeny + -ic.] 1. Producing hysteria; also, related to the production of hysteria.

> In order to illustrate further the intimate connection between certain morbid forms of sleep and the hysterical state, I shall briefly allude to the so-called "hysterogenic" and "hypnogenic" pressure points discovered by Professors Charcot and Pitres. Fortnightly Rev., N.S., XLI. 737.
>
> She presents various hysterogenic points, one cutaneous in the precordial region, below the mamma, and one over the right ovary. Alien. and Neurol., VII. 365.

2. In bot., a term applied to those intercellular spaces in plants which are formed in old, partly differentiated tissues. Compare protogenic.

hysterogenous (his-tę-roj'e-nus), a. [< hysterogeny + -ous.] Same as hysterogenic.

hysterogeny (his-tę-roj'e-ni), n. [< NL. hysteria, hysteria, + Gr. -γένεια: see -geny.] Production of hysteria; induction of hysterics or hysterical states.

hysteroid (his'tę-roid), a. [< NL. hysteria, hysteria, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] In pathol., resembling hysteria: as, a hysteroid disease or symptom.

> Hysteroid conditions and feigned diseases. Alien. and Neurol., VI. 475.

Hysteroid convulsion. Same as hystero-epilepsy.

hysteroidal (his-tę-roi'dal), a. [< hysteroid + -al.] Same as hysteroid.

> Their value is much diminished by the unmistakable hysteroidal impress which they bear. Medical News, L. 37.

hysterology[1] (his-tę-rol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge of or a treatise on the uterus.

hysterology[2] (his-tę-rol'ō-ji), n. [= F. hystérologie, < LL. hysterologia, < Gr. ὑστερολογία, hysteron-proteron, < ὑστερος, later, latter; cf. ὑστερολόγος, speaking last, < ὑστερος, the latter (see hysteresis), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Same as hysteron-proteron, 1.

hysteromania (his″tę-rō-mā'ni-ä), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus (see hysteria), + μανία, madness.] 1. Hysterical mania; a mania developing in persons who have previously exhibited hysterical symptoms, and which presents many hysterical features, with delusions, hallucinations, illusions, and an unrestrained endeavor to attract attention.—2. Nymphomania.

hysterometer (his-tę-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the uterus; a uterine sound.

hysteron-proteron (his″tę-ron-prot'ę-ron), n. [LL., < Gr. ὕστερον πρότερον*, lit. the latter first, also called πρωθύστερον, lit. the first last (latter); neut. of ὑστερος, later, latter, and πρότερος, compar., former, fore, first (πρῶτος, superl., first).] 1. In rhet., a figure by which what should come last in order of time or of logical sequence is introduced first, and vice versa; a transposition of words involving an inversion of the natural and logical order of events or subjects. The motive for the use of this figure is to mention first the idea which is the more prominently before the mind. An example is: "Moriamur, et in media arma ruamus" (Let us die, and rush into the midst of the fray), Virgil, Æneid, ii. 353. Also called hysterology and prothysteron, and sometimes considered the same as anastrophe.

2. In logic, the fallacy which consists in offering as a proof of what is really an axiom some theorem which can be proved only by means of that axiom.

hysterophore (his'tę-rō-fōr), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A pessary for supporting the uterus.

Hysterophyta (his-tę-rof'i-tä), n. pl. [NL. (Elias Fries, 1821), pl. of hysterophytum: see hysterophyte.] A section of thallophytes containing the single class Fungi.

hysterophytal (his″tę-rō-fī'tal), a. [< Hysterophyta.] Having the characters or appearance of the Hysterophyta or Fungi.

★ hysterophyte (his'tę-rō-fīt), n. [< NL. hysterophytum, < Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + φυτόν, a plant.] Properly, a member of the Hysterophyta; a fungus of any kind; in common usage, any fungus growing upon organic matter, from which it derives its nourishment; a saprophyte.

hysterotome (his'tę-rō-tōm), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + τομός, cutting.] An instrument for cutting the uterus; especially, a knife or scissors for enlarging the cervical canal of the uterus.

hysterotomy (his-tę-rot'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., the operation of cutting into the uterus.

hysterotrachelorrhaphy (his″tę-rō-trā-kē-lor'-a-fi), n. [< Gr. ὑστέρα, the uterus, + τράχηλος, the neck, + ῥαφή, a sewing, < ῥάπτειν, sew.] In surg., a plastic operation on the neck of the uterus.

hystriciasis (his-tri-sī'a-sis), n. [NL., < L. hystrix (hystric-), porcupine, + -iasis.] Same as hystricismus.

hystricid (his'tri-sid), n. A rodent mammal of the family Hystricidæ.

Hystricidæ (his-tris'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hystrix (Hystric-) + -idæ.] A family of simplicident rodents in which the pelage consists in part of stout spines; the porcupines. They are of large size as compared with other hystricine rodents. Some are terrestrial and fossorial, with very long spines, and confined to the old world; others are chiefly arboreal, with short spines, and confined to the new world. The latter are now placed in a separate family, Erethizontidæ (which see, in the supplement).

Hystricinæ (his-tri-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hystrix (Hystric-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of Hystricidæ; the old-world or ground porcupines. They inhabit the Palearctic, Indian, and Ethiopian regions. There are two leading genera, Hystrix and Atherura. The subfamily is sometimes called Atherurinæ.

hystricine (his'tri-sin), a. [< L. hystrix (hystric-), a porcupine, + -ine[1].] Resembling or related to a porcupine; hystricomorphic.

hystricismus (his-tri-siz'mus), n. [NL., < L. hystrix (hystric-), porcupine, + -ismus, E. -ism.] In pathol., an extreme form of ichthyosis, in which the epidermis grows out into spines. Also hystriciasis.

hystricomorph (his'tri-kō-môrf), n. Any member of the Hystricomorpha.

Hystricomorpha (his″tri-kō-môr'fä), n. pl. [NL., < L. Hystrix (Hystric-), < Gr. ὑστριξ (ὑστριχ-), porcupine, + μορφή, form.] A series of simplicident rodents; one of two prime divisions of rodents, including the porcupines and their congeners. The group is characterized by normal upper incisors and distinct tibia and fibula, the angular part of the mandible springing from the outer side of the bony covering of the incisor. The dental formula is: 1 incisor in each half-jaw above and below, no canines, and 1 premolar and 3 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw — in all, 20 (except in Ctenodactylus, which has no premolars). The skull has no distinct postorbital process (except in Chætomys). The group corresponds to the Hystricina of Waterhouse, and includes the seven families Hydrochœridæ, Caviidæ, Dinomyidæ, Dasyproctidæ, Chinchillidæ, Hystricidæ, and Octodontidæ. There is the greatest diversity in the external aspect and habits of these animals, few of which specially resemble porcupines in general appearance. Except four remarkable outlying genera of Octodontidæ and the old-world porcupines of the genera Hystrix and Atherura, the whole series is American, and almost confined to South America; for there are only three West Indian forms (as Capromys), and only two species of porcupine, of the genus Erethizon, occur in North America.

hystricomorphic (his″tri-kō-môr'fik), a. [< Hystricomorpha + -ic.] Pertaining to the Hystricomorpha, or having their characters; hystricine, in a broad sense.

Hystrix (his'triks), n. [L., also written Histrix (stem hystric- instead of histrich-*), < Gr. ὑστριξ (ὑστριχ-), a porcupine, in pl. bristles, appar. < ὑς, a hog, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair.] 1. The typical genus of Hystricidæ, formerly conterminous with the family, now restricted to the common old-world porcupines, with very long spines or quills, such as those used for penholders. H. cristata is the leading species, inhabiting southern Europe and northern Africa. See porcupine.—2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

hyte (hīt), a. [Origin obscure.] Mad; crazy. Also hite. [Scotch.]

> The witching, curs'd, delicious blinkers > Ha'e put me hyte. Burns, To Major Logan.

hythe, n. See hithe.

I, 1. The ninth letter and third vowel in the English alphabet. The character comes, like most of its predecessors (see A, etc.), through the Latin and Greek from the Phenician, and ultimately perhaps from the Egyptian. The correspondences are as follows:

Egyptian. Hieroglyphic. Hieratic. | Phenician. | Early Greek and Latin.

The Phenician character represented rather a consonant, a y, than a vowel, but it was converted to vowel value by the Greeks, and has continued to bear that value since (though in Latin used as consonant also). Our "short i" of it, etc., is not far from the original sound; yet nearer is the sound which we perversely call "long e" (of mete, meet, meat, etc.), or the i of machine, pique, etc. Because the words which anciently showed this latter sound have in great measure changed it to a diphthongal utterance (nearly ä + i, or the ai of aisle), we have come to call the altered sound "long i." The true i-sounds (in pick, pique) are close vowels, made with as near an approximation of the organs as is possible without giving rise to a fricative utterance. The approximation is made by the upper flat surface of the tongue to the palate, at or near the point where a complete closure makes a k-sound. Hence the i-sound has palatal affinities, and it (as also in less degree the e) is widely active in palatalizing a consonant: for example, in converting in modern English a t to ch, a d to j, an s to sh, a z to zh; having in older English, and in other languages, a like influence on a k or g. Hence, also, it is a vowel close to a consonant, and very nearly identical with the consonantal y, into which it passes freely. (See Y.) I has also gained in many words before r the same sound that e and u have in the same situation: for example, fir, first. It enters into various digraphs, as ai, ei, ie, oi, ui.

2. As a symbol: (a) The number one in the Roman notation. It is repeated for subsequent numbers up to three (formerly to four) (II, III, IIII). These numerals placed after symbols of higher numbers increase their value: as, VI, six; VII, seven, etc.; XII, twelve; LIII, fifty-three; formerly CIIII, one hundred and four. Instead of the old IIII and VIIII for four and nine, an I is now prefixed to V or X to decrease the value by one: thus, IV, four; IX, nine.

> Thider come the kynge Vrien of gorre, that was a yonge knyght, and moche preised in armes, and with hym iiij C [four hundred] knyghtes. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 108.

(b) In logic, a symbol of the particular affirmative proposition: derived from the second vowel of the Latin word affirmo, I assert. See A[1], 2 (b).

> A doeth affirme, E doeth denigh, which are bothe universall:
> I doeth affirme, O doeth denigh, which we particular call. Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason (1551).

(c) In chem., the symbol for iodine.—3. An abbreviation—(a) In dental formulæ, in zoöl., for incisor. (b†) Same as i. e. (c) See i. e., i. q.

I[2] (ī), pron. and n.; poss. my or mine, obj. (dat. and acc.) me, pl. nom. we, poss. our or ours, obj. (dat. and acc.) us. [Also dial. I (pron. ē), a, ich; < ME. i, reduced form of (Northern) ik, assibilated (Southern) ich, uch, < AS. ic = OS. ic, ik, ec = OFries. ik = D. ik = MLG. There are in AS. and E. four apparent stems, represented by I, me, we, and us: see me, we, our, us.] I. pron. The nominative case of the pronoun of the first person; the word by which a speaker or writer denotes himself.

> Mow i geten a grece that i gaynli knowe.
> William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 636.
>
> But ik am oold: me list not pley for age.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Reeve's Tale, l. 13.

> But as he grows he gathers much,
> And learns the use of I, and me,
> And finds "I am not what I see,
> And other than the things I touch."
> Tennyson, In Memoriam, xlv.

[The pronoun may take (rarely) a qualifying adjective.

> Poor I was slain when Bassianus died.
> Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3.]

I AM, a title of Jehovah (Ex. iii. 14). The Hebrew word here rendered I AM is equivalent in meaning to Jehovah, and differs from it very slightly in form. In the margin of the revised version it is rendered "I will be," and some make it "I shall be." The word expresses absolute, and therefore unchanging and eternal, being.

II. n. 1. The pronoun I used as a substantive.—2. In metaph., the object of self-consciousness; that which is conscious of itself as thinking, feeling, and willing; the ego.

> It is I that perceive, I that imagine, I that remember, I that attend, I that compare, I that feel, I that desire, I that will, I that am conscious. The I, indeed, is only manifested in one or other of these special modes; but it is manifested in them all; they are only the phenomena of the I, and, therefore, the science conversant about the phenomena of mind is, most simply and unambiguously, said to be conversant about the phenomena of the I or the Ego. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., ix.

I[3]† (ī), interj. An obsolete form of aye[3].

> Bayes. They do me the right, Sir, to approve of what I do.
> Johns. I, I, they will clap, I warrant you.
> Buckingham, The Rehearsal, i.

i[4]†, n. An occasional obsolete spelling of eye. Skelton.

i[5], i'. [< ME. i = Icel. i, reduced form of in: see in[1], and cf. a[3], reduced form of an, on, and a[2], reduced form of an[1].] A light form of in[1]: as, "a worm i' the bud," Shak.

i-[1]. [ME. i-, y-, sometimes e-, a-, early ge-, < AS. ge- = OS. gi- = OFries. gi-, ge-, ie- = D. ge- = MLG. LG. ge- = OHG. ga-, gi-, ge- (ka-, ke-), MHG. gi-, ge-, G. ge- (extremely common) = Icel. g- (scarcely found except in glīkr, mod. līkr = AS. gelīc, E. like[2], a.) = Goth. ga-: a general Teut. prefix, in some uses equiv. to L. con- (com-, co-, etc.) = Gr. ξυν-, συν-, together, with (see con-, syn-), but hardly of the same origin.] A prefix (often spelled y-, and sometimes e- and a-) common in Middle English, as in i-blent, i-cast, i-don, i-take, i-cleped, i-wis, etc. (also spelled y-blent, y-cast, y-don, etc.), but entirely lost in modern English, except as traces remain in y-wis, adv. (sometimes erroneously written I wis), and in y-clept and a few other archaic perfect-participle forms affected by Spenser and other poets, and in alike, along[2], among, enough, everywhere, handiwork, and a few other common words in which the syllable concerned is not now recognized as a prefix. This prefix was extremely common in Anglo-Saxon, being used with nouns, adjectives, pronouns, and adverbs (having with these a collective or generalizing force, often so indefinite as not to be felt), but especially with verbs (having with these a collective force often translatable by together or with, or a completive or transitive force, and hence much used in the formation of transitive from intransitive verbs); in many instances it added nothing to the force of the verb to which it was prefixed. In Anglo-Saxon many verbs, as in German all verbs, without this or another prefix in the finite forms, take it in the past participle.

i-[2]. A form of the negative prefix in-[3] before gn- in some words of Latin origin, as in ignoble, ignore, ignorant, etc.

-i-[1]. [See i-[1].] An apparent connective, but properly a prefix, in hand-i-work and hand-i-craft (altered from hand-craft in imitation of handiwork), and (now spelled -y-) in ever-y-where. See these words, and compare i-[1].

-i-[2]. [L. -i-, being the stem-vowel, original, conformed, or supplied as a connective, of the first element in the compound; = Gr. -ο-, rarely -ι-: see -o-.] The usual 'connecting vowel,' properly the stem-vowel of the first element, of compound words taken or formed from the Latin, as in mult-i-form, cent-i-ped, ens-i-form, omn-i-potent, aur-i-ferous, bell-i-gerent, etc. In forming New Latin compounds, the vowel is regularly -i-, as scut-i-fera [< L. scutum (scuto-) + -fera], even when the second element is Greek, as scut-i-phora [< L. scutum (scuto-), + Gr. φόρος]; but in the latter case the vowel -o-, proper to Greek compounds, is often used, as scut-o-pterus [< L. scutum (scuto-) + Gr. πτερόν]. Even when both elements are Latin, the connective -o- is sometimes used; but it is properly confined to Greek and other non-Latin compounds. See -o-.

-ia[1]. [L. -ia, Gr. -ία, being -i-, stem-vowel, + -a[1], nom. suffix of first declension: see -a[1].] A termination in Latin and Greek nouns (chiefly feminine), many of them in English use, being -a[1] preceded by -i-, a stem-vowel, formative or euphonic, as in tib-ia, fasc-ia, milit-ia, man-ia, scor-ia, etc. When such forms are Anglicized, the termination becomes -y, as in family, from Latin familia.

-ia[2]. [L. -ia, Gr. -ία, being -i-, stem-vowel, + -a[2], nom. pl. suffix: see -a[2].] A termination in Latin and Greek nouns, many of them in English use, being -a[2] preceded by -i-, a stem-vowel, formative or euphonic, as in regal-ia, saturnal-ia, etc.

-iac, -iacal. See -ac.

Iache (ī'a-kē), n. [NL., < Gr. Ἰάχη, a nymph, companion of Proserpine; cf. ἰαχή, a cry, shout, a joyous sound, < ἰάχειν, cry, shout.] A genus of humming-birds of the family Trochilidæ, of which the type is the broad-billed hummer, I. latirostris, a Mexican species, occurring also in the United States. D. G. Elliot, 1879. Also called Circe.

iacint†, n. See jacinth.

-ial. A form of -al, being -al preceded by an original or euphonic vowel i-. See -al.

Ialtris (ī-al'tris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰάλλειν (verbal adj. ἰαλτός), send forth.] A genus of colubriform ophidians, related to Dromicus, but having no solid teeth on the maxillary bone behind the long median one. The type is I. vultuosa of Hayti. E. D. Cope, Proc. Acad. Nat. Sci., Phila., 1862, p. 73.

iamb (ī'amb), n. [= F. iambe = Sp. yambo = Pg. It. jambo, < L. iambus: see iambus.] Same as iambus. [Rare.]

> The license is sometimes carried so far as to add three short syllables to the last iamb. Brande.

iambelegus (ī-am-bel'e-gus), n. [LL., < Gr. ἰαμβέλεγος, < ἰαμβος, iambus, + ἔλεγος, an elegiac poem: see iambus and elegy.] In anc. pros., an episynthetic meter consisting of an iambic colon followed by a dactylic penthemimeres (half an elegiac pentameter).

iambic (ī-am'bik), a. and n. [= F. iambique = Sp. yámbico = Pg. It. jambico, < LL. iambicus, < Gr. ἰαμβικός, iambic, < ἴαμβος, an iambus: see iambus.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the iambus; employing iambics: as, iambic meter; an iambic poet.—2. Consisting of an iambus, or of iambics: as, an iambic foot; an iambic verse or poem.—Iambic class (of feet). Same as diplasic or double class. See diplasic.

II. n. In pros.: (a) Same as iambus. (b) A verse or metrical period consisting of iambi. Iambics have been a favorite or prevalent form of verse in the poetry of many nations. They were used among the Greeks from early times in popular poetry, especially of a festive or a vituperative character. English heroic verse is the iambic pentapody or trimeter brachycatalectic (⏑ – ⏑ – | ⏑ – ⏑ – | ⏑ –). Iambics of various lengths form the great bulk of all English poetry, other meters being comparatively rare. See choliamb, Hipponactean, ischiorrhogic, scazon, trimeter, senarius, septenarius, octonarius.

iambical (ī-am'bi-kal), a. [< iambic + -al.] Same as iambic. [Rare.]

Amongst us I name but two Iambical poets, Gabriel Harvey and Richard Stanyhurst, because I have seen no more in this kind. Meres (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 100).

iambically (ī-am′bi-ka̤l-i), adv. In the manner of an iambic.

iambize (ī-am′bīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. iambized, ppr. iambizing. [< Gr. ἰαμβίζειν, assail in iambics, lampoon, < ἴαμβος, iambus, iambic verse, a lampoon: see iambus.] To satirize in iambic verse. [Rare.]

Iambic was the measure in which they used to iambize each other. Twining, tr. of Aristotle on Poetry, i. § 6.

iambographer (ī-am-bog′ra̤-fėr), n. [< Gr. ἰαμβογράφος, a writer of iambics, < ἴαμβος, iambus, + γράφειν, write.] A writer of iambic poetry. [Rare.]

Mont. I am an iambographer; now it is out.
Cata. For honour's sake, what's that?
Mont. One of the sourest versifiers that ever crept out of Parnassus. Shirley, Maid's Revenge, i. 2.

iambographic (ī-am-bō-graf′ik), a. [< Gr. ἰαμβογράφος, a writer of iambics (see iambographer), + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the writing of iambics.—2. Accustomed to write iambic poetry. [Rare.]

The melic and iambographic poets.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 378.

iambus (ī-am′bus), n.; pl. iambi (-bī). [< L. iambus, < Gr. ἰαμβος, an iambus, an iambic verse, an iambic poem, esp. a lampoon; so called, it is said, because first used by satiric writers; < ἰάπτειν, send or drive on, throw, assail with words, = L. jacere (iacere), throw: see jactitate, jet[1].] In pros., a foot of two syllables, the first short or unaccented and the second long or accented.

The iambus of modern or accentual versification consists of an unaccented syllable followed by an accented one, without regard to the relative time taken in pronouncing the two syllables. Thus in English verse the words dīlight′, dīlāte′, ēmīt′, ābēt′ would all be treated as iambi, while on the principles of ancient prosody the first of these words would be an iambus, but the second a spondee (an anapestic spondee, – ⏑ –), the third a trochee, and the last a pyrrhic. The iambus of Greek and Latin poetry (⏑ –) is quantitative, and as the first syllable is short, and the second being long is equal to two shorts, the whole foot has a magnitude of three shorts (is trisemic). Also called iamb, iambic.

-ian. A form of -an, being -an preceded by an original or euphonic vowel i-. See -an.

Ianthina (ī-an′thi-nä), n. [NL., fem. of ianthinus, < Gr. ἰάνθινος, violet-colored, < ἰον (Fίον*), violet (= L. vio-la, violet), + ἄνθος, a flower.] 1. The representative genus of the family Ianthinidæ; the oceanic violet-snails. One of the best-known species is I. fragilis. They are found floating in Violet-snail (Ianthina fragilis). a, float; b, eggs; c, gills; d, tentacles.

shoals on the open seas of warm latitudes, buoyed up by the peculiar float attached to the foot, and are often cast ashore in vast numbers during storms. The animal when irritated pours out a violet secretion, serving to some extent for concealment, like the ink of the cuttlefish.

2. [l. c.] A violet-snail.

Ianthinidæ (ī-an-thin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ianthina + -idæ.] A family of oceanic gastropods, having a small foot, the under side of which is connected with a vascular appendage or float, which buoys the animal in the water, and under which the eggs are received; the violet-snails. The shell is thin and violet-colored, with a twisted pillar, 4-sided aperture, and waved outer lip giving passage to exposed gills. The head is large, obtuse, and protruded beyond the mouth, with a short proboscis and bifid tentacles. The radula is without central teeth, but has many long, curved, pen-like teeth on the sides. The remarkable appendage or float is several times as long as the body. There was formerly much question as to the position of the family, which has even been classed with the Heteropoda.

Iapetus (ī-ap′e-tus), n. [L., < Gr. Ἰαπετός, in myth. a Titan, son of Uranus and Ge.] 1. In astron., the eighth, formerly called the fifth, of the satellites of Saturn.—2. In entom., a genus of homopterous insects, of the family Fulgoridæ. Stål, 1863.

Iapygian (ī-a̤-pij′i-a̤n), a. and n. [< L. Iapygia, Gr. Ἰαπυγία, < L. Iapyges, Gr. Ἰάπυγες (see Iapyx), + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Iapygia, an ancient division of southeastern Italy, so called by the Greeks, corresponding to the peninsular part of Apulia, anciently also called Messapia and Calabria, and sometimes extended to the whole of Apulia.

II. n. One of the ancient Italic race inhabiting Iapygia, including the Messapians and other tribes.

iapygid (ī-ap′i-jid), n. A member of the family Iapygidæ.

Iapygidæ (ī-a̤-pij′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Iapyx (-yg-) + -idæ.] A family of thysanurous insects, represented by the genus Iapyx, having a pair of anal forceps instead of bristles, and no movable appendages along the under side of the body.

Iapyx (ī-ā′piks), n. [NL., < L. Iapyx, < Gr. Ἰάπυξ (-υγ-), the northwest or rather west-northwest wind, pl. a river in Italy, also Iapyx, the son of Dædalus, the mythical progenitor (eponym) of the Iapyges, L. Iapyges, Gr. Ἰάπυγες, a people of southern Italy.] The representative genus of insects of the family Iapygidæ. There are several eyeless species. I. solifugus is one of southern Europe, of pale color, about half an inch long; I. gigas of Cyprus is twice as long. A United States species is I. subterraneus, found under stones near the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky.

iarfine, n. [Ir., < iar, after, + fine, family, tribe.] One of the groups of five into which the ancient Irish clans or families were organized. See geilfine.

-iasis. [NL., < L. -iasis, < Gr. -ίασις, as in ἐλεφαντίασις, elephantiasis, φθειρίασις, phthiriasis, etc., from verbs in -άειν, contr. -ᾶν, the -ι- being of the stem, or euphonic.] A termination of New Latin names of diseases, as elephantiasis, phthiriasis, psoriasis, hypochondriasis. Also -asis.

iasp†, n. See jasp, jasper. Spenser.

Iassidæ, Iassus. See Jassidæ, Jassus.

Iastian (ī-as′ti-a̤n), n. [Gr. Ἰάστιος, Ionic, < Ἰάς, Ionic: see Ionic.] Same as Ionian.

iatraliptic† (ī-ā-tra̤-lip′tik), a. [< Gr. ἰατραλείπτης, a surgeon who practises by anointing, friction, and the like (ἡ ἰατραλειπτική, sc. τέχνη, such practice), < ἰατρός, a physician, + ἀλείπτης, an anointer, < ἀλείφειν, anoint.] Curing by ointments and frictions.—The iatraliptic method, in med., same as epidermic method (which see, under epidermic).

iatric (ī-at′rik), a. [< Gr. ἰατρικός, < ἰατρός, a physician, < ἰᾶσθαι, cure, heal.] Relating to medicine or physicians.

iatrical (ī-at′ri-ka̤l), a. [< iatric + -al.] Same as iatric.

iatrochemical (ī-ā-trō-kem′i-ka̤l), a. [< Gr. ἰατρός, a physician, + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to the chemical theory of medicine: applied to a school of medicine of the seventeenth century which, progressive in its tendencies, applied with a certain exclusiveness and extravagance chemical doctrines to the explanation of physiological and pathological phenomena: opposed to iatrophysical.

iatrochemist (ī-ā-trō-kem′ist), n. [< Gr. ἰατρός, a physician, + E. chemist: cf. iatromathematician.] A member of the iatrochemical school.

iatroliptic†, iatroleptic†, a. Erroneous forms of iatraliptic.

iatrology (ī-ā-trol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἰατρολογία, the study of medicine, < ἰατρός, a physician, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on medicine or on physicians; also, the science of medicine.

iatromathematical (ī-ā-trō-math-ē-mat′i-ka̤l), a. [< Gr. ἰατρός, a physician, + E. mathematical. See iatromathematician.] Same as iatrophysical.

Some iatromathematical professors are too superstitious, in my judgment. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 276.

iatromathematician (ī-ā-trō-math′ē-mā-tish′a̤n), n. [< Gr. ἰατρός, a physician, + E. mathematician, after Gr. ἰατρομαθηματικοί, pl., those who practised medicine in conjunction with astrology, < ἰατρός, a physician, + μαθηματικός, a mathematician.] A member of the iatrophysical school.

iatromechanical (ī-ā-trō-mē-kan′i-ka̤l), a. [< Gr. ἰατρός, a physician, + E. mechanical.] Same as iatrophysical.

iatrophysical (ī-ā-trō-fiz′i-ka̤l), a. [< Gr. ἰατρός, a physician, + E. physical.] A term applied to a school of physicians which took its rise in Italy in the seventeenth century. They sought to explain the functions of the body and the application of remedies by statical and hydraulic laws, and were eager students of anatomy, since it was only by accurate knowledge of all the parts that they could apply their mathematical and dynamical principles.

ib. An abbreviation of ibidem.

ibet†. An obsolete form of been[1], past participle of be[1].

I-beam (ī′bēm), n. Any form of rolled iron having a cross-section resembling the letter I.

ibent†. An obsolete form of been[1], past participle of be[1].

Iberian[1] (ī-bē′ri-a̤n), a. and n. [< L. Iberia, Hiberia, < Gr. Ἰβηρία, the ancient Greek name of Spain, < Ἴβηρες, L. Ibēres, Hibēres, sometimes Ibēri, Hibēri, the inhabitants of Spain.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to ancient Iberia in Europe, which included Spain and Portugal and part of southern France: as, the Iberian peninsula.

Roving the Celtick and Iberian fields.
Milton, Comus, l. 60.

2. Of or pertaining to the inhabitants of Iberia; specifically, in art, noting the productions of the earlier races of the Spanish peninsula, which show no trace of Roman influence.

II. n. 1. One of the primitive inhabitants of Spain. The Basques are supposed to be descendants of the ancient Spanish Iberians.—2. The language of the ancient Iberians, of which modern Basque is supposed to be the representative.

Iberian[2] (ī-bē′ri-a̤n), a. [< L. Iberia, Hiberia, < Iberes, Hiberes, Gr. Ἴβηρες, the ancient inhabitants of the region now called Georgia.] Of or pertaining to ancient Iberia in Asia, nearly corresponding to Georgia in Russian Transcaucasia.

From . . . Margiana to the Hyrcanian cliffs
Of Caucasus, and dark Iberian dales.
Milton, P. R., iii. 318.

Iberideæ (ī-bē-rid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Iberis (-id-) + -eæ.] A tribe of cruciferous plants, typified by the genus Iberis, now referred to the tribe Sinapeæ.

Candytuft (Iberis umbellata). a, flower; b, fruit; c, seed.

Iberis (ī-bē′ris), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰβηρίς, a kind of pepperwort, prob. < Ἰβηρία, Iberia, Spain, as its place of growth.] A genus of cruciferous plants, consisting of annual, perennial, and shrubby species, distinguished by having the two outer petals larger than the others. About 30 species are known, mostly natives of the Mediterranean region and of the East. Several species are cultivated in gardens, under the name of candytuft. I. amara, the bitter candytuft, is found growing as a weed in western and central Europe. The root, stems, leaves, and especially the seeds, possess medicinal properties. It is said to have been used by the ancients in cases of rheumatism, gout, and other diseases. I. umbellata is the purple candytuft.

iberite (ī-bē′rīt), n. [< L. Iberia, Spain, + -ite[2].] A hydrated altered iolite found in the Spanish province of Toledo.

ibex (ī′beks), n. [< L. ibex, a kind of goat, the chamois.] 1. A wild goat, the bouquetin, steinbok, or other species of the genus Ibex. There are several different species, inhabiting mountain-ranges of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the best-known of which, and the one to which the name was originally given, is the steinbok or bouquetin of the Alps and Apennines, Capra ibex or Ibex ibex. The male is about 4½ feet long, and 2 feet 8 inches high at the shoulders; it sometimes attains a weight of 200 pounds. The color is brownish- or reddish-gray in summer, and gray in winter. The horns are very large (sometimes 3 feet along the curve), closely approxi-

Alpine Ibex or Steinbok (Capra ibex).

mated at the base, diverging regularly to the tip, curved sharply backward and outward, and longitudinally ridged on each side, the flattened front between the ridges being crossed with many transverse ridges or nodes. It has a short dark beard, and the ears and tail are partly white. The female is smaller, of a gray color, and its horns are shorter and more like those of the domestic goat. The kids are gray. The ibex of the Pyrenees is a closely related species, Ibex pyrenaica; its horns are more divergent for some distance and then incurved at the tip, presenting when viewed together from the front a resemblance to a lyre; each horn is compressed, and keeled in front. See ægagrus.

2. [cap.] A genus of ibexes, or a subgenus of Capra.

ibid. An abbreviation of ibidem.

Ibidæ (ī'bi-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Ibididæ.

ibidem (i-bī'dem), adv. [L., in the same place, < ibi, there (< i-, pronominal root as in i-s, that, he (see he[1]), + -bi, dat. or locative ending as in ti-bi: see bi-[1], be-[1], by[1]), + -dem, a demonstrative suffix as in i-dem, the same, etc.] In the same place; at the place or in the book already mentioned: used in order to avoid the repetition of references. Commonly abbreviated to ibid. or ib.

Ibides (ī'bi-dēz), n. pl. [L., pl. of Ibis, q. v.] A series of altricial grallatorial birds, a suborder of Herodiones or Pelargomorphæ, corresponding to the Hemiglottides of Nitzsch, and composed of the two families Ibididæ and Platalæidæ, or the ibises and spoonbills. They have a schizorhinal skull, with produced and recurved mandibular angle; a sternum double-notched on each side; the carotids double; two normal intestinal cæca; an extremely small tongue; an ambiens muscle; a tufted oil-gland; no pulviplumes; tarsi reticulate (rarely scutellate); the hallux not completely insistent; the middle claw scarcely or not at all pectinate; and the sides of the upper mandible deeply grooved for its whole length. The Ibides are one of three series of Herodiones, the others being the Herodii proper, or herons, and the Ciconiæ, or storks. The genera and species are numerous. Also Ibidides.

Ibididæ (i-bid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ibis (Ibid-) + -idæ.] One of two families of Ibides, of the order Herodiones; the ibises. They have a long, slender, subcylindric, and decurved bill, deeply grooved on the sides of the upper mandible, and resembling a curlew's. There are about 24 species, differing much in minor details of structure, so that they have been made types of almost as many genera. See ibis. Also Ibidæ.

Ibidides (ī-bid'i-dēz), n. pl. Same as Ibides.

ibidine (ī'bi-din), a. [< L. ibis (ibid-) + -ine[2].] Having the character of an ibis; of or pertaining to the Ibides. Encyc. Brit., III. 713.

Ibidorhynchus (ī″bi-dō-ring'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰβις (ἰβιδ-), ibis, + ῥύγχος, bill.] A notable genus of curlews, of the family Scolopacidæ: so called from the likeness of the bill to that of an ibis. I. struthersi of Asia is the only species. G. R. Gray, 1844. Originally written Ibidorhyncha. N. A. Vigors, 1831.

ibigau, ibijau (ib'i-gou, -jou), n. The native name of the earth-eater, giant night-jar, or grand goatsucker of South America, Nyctibius grandis, a bird of the family Caprimulgidæ. See Nyctibius.

-ibility. The termination of abstract nouns formed in -ity from adjectives in -ible, as in credibility, legibility, etc., from credible, legible, etc. It is properly the double suffix -bility, with a preceding original or euphonic vowel i-. Compare -ability, and see -bility.

ibis (ī'bis), n. [= F. Sp. Pg. ibis = It. ibi, < L. ibis, < Gr. ἰβις, ibis; of Egyptian origin.] 1. A bird of the family Ibididæ, or of the genus Ibis in a wide sense. There are about 24 species, of numerous modern genera, chiefly inhabitants of the lakes and swamps of the warmer parts of the globe. They resemble herons, storks, and other large altricial grallatorial birds. They feed on fish, reptiles, and other animals, chiefly aquatic, nest on the ground or in trees or bushes, lay a few eggs of a uniform color, and rear their young in the nest. The most notable species, and the one to which the name ibis appears originally to have been given, is the sacred ibis of Egypt and other parts of Africa (Ibis religiosa), an object of veneration among the old Egyptians, Sacred Ibis of Egypt (Ibis religiosa).

frequently mummified after death, and represented in pictographs upon their monuments. It is about 2 feet long; the plumage is white and black; the naked head, bill, and feet are black. The glossy, bay, or black ibis (Ibis falcinellus, Falcinellus igneus, Plegadis falcinellus, etc.) is the most nearly cosmopolitan species, inhabiting chiefly the old world, but straying to North America, and reaching cold-temperate latitudes in both hemispheres. It is iridescent with green and black, varied by opaque dark-chestnut tints. The white-faced glossy ibis, Ibis guarauna, is a related species abundant in warm parts of America, and found in the southwestern United States. The white ibis, Eudocimus albus, inhabits the southern United States, where it is known as the Spanish curlew. The plumage of the adult is pure white, with black-tipped wings. A splendid species of tropical and subtropical America is the scarlet ibis, Eudocimus ruber, which when adult is scarlet, with black-tipped wings. Many of the other species present equally notable characters, as the Australian strawnecked ibis (Geronticus or Carphibis spinicollis), the African (Geronticus (Hagedashia) hagedash), the white Japanese (Geronticus (Nipponia) nippon), etc.

2. [cap.] [NL.] The leading genus of the family Ibididæ, formerly more than coextensive with the family, but successively restricted to various generic types of ibises. Its current uses are now for that group which the sacred ibis typifies, and for that of which the scarlet ibis is the type. Modern genera which have been detached from the old genus Ibis are Falcinellus of Bechstein, Geronticus, Eudocimus, Harpiprion, Theristicus, Phimosus, Cercibis of Wagler, Threskiornis of G. R. Gray, Pseudibis of Hodgson, Hagedashia of Bonaparte, Leucibis, Carphibis, Lophotibis, Comatibis, Molypbdophanus, Bostrychia, Nipponia of Reichenbach, and others.

3. Some bird like an ibis, or supposed to be an ibis, as a wood-ibis or wood-stork. See Tantalinæ.

Ibla (ib'lä), n. [NL.] A genus of cirripeds of the order Thoracica and family Pollicipedidæ. It is related to Scalpellum; in both genera some species are dioecious, while others present the unique combination of males with hermaphrodites.

Iblees, n. See Eblis.

Iblidæ (ib'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ibla + -idæ.] A family of cirripeds, named from the genus Ibla. Originally written Ibladæ. W. E. Leach, 1825.

Ibycter (ī-bik'tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰβυκτήρ, in Cretan, one who begins a war-song.] A South American genus of vulturine hawks, of the subfamily Polyborinæ, family Falconidæ, having the nostrils circular, the head partly denuded, the tail normal, and the coloration chiefly black. It is related to Daptrius, Milvago, Senex, and Phalcobænus. The type is the so-called gallinaceous eagle, Falco aquilinus, now called Ibycter americanus, which is black, with white abdomen and thighs, eyes and bare parts of head red, and blue cere; its length is about 19½ inches. (Vieillot, Analyse d'une Nouvelle Ornith. (1816), p. 22.) Gymnops is a synonym. Also written Ibicter. Kaup, 1845.

Ibycter americanus.

-ic. [Formerly -ick, -ik, often -ique, < ME. -ik; = F. -ique = Sp. Pg. It. -ico (cf. D. G. -isch = Dan. Sw. -isk), < L. -icus = Gr. -ικος, a term. consisting of the stem-vowel -i- (original or supplied: see -i-[2]) + formative -co- = Gr. κο-, + nom. ending -s = Gr. -ς; = Goth. -a-gs = AS. -ig, E. -y[1], q. v.] 1. An adjective termination of Latin or Greek origin, very common in adjectives taken from Latin or Greek, as in public, metallic, etc., and also much used in modern formations, as artistic, electric, etc. Such words, derived from or modeled upon Latin or Greek adjectives, may be also or exclusively nouns, as public, mystic, logic, music. In Middle English this termination was usually written -ik or -ike; and from an early period down to the nineteenth century the form -ick (classick, critick, musick, ethicks, mathematicks, etc.) was used, some dictionaries retaining it till about 1840.

2. In chem., a suffix denoting a less basic or more acid state than the termination -ous, as ferric chlorid, distinguished from ferrous chlorid, phosphoric anhydrid, distinguished from phosphorous anhydrid, etc.

Icacina (ī-kā-sī'nä), n. [NL., prob. dim. of Sp. icaco.] A small genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, type of the family Icacinaceæ and of the tribe Icacineæ. They have a 5-cleft or 5-parted calyx; 5 hypogynous valvate petals; 5 stamens with filiform filaments, alternate with the petals, and inserted on a hypogynous disk; and a 1-celled, 2-seeded ovary. They are evergreen shrubs, with ascending or climbing branches and smooth leaves. Five species only are known, natives of tropical Africa.

Icacinaceæ (ī-kas-i-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Icacina + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Sapindales, of which the genus Icacina is the type.

Icacineæ (ī-kā-sin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Icacina + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Icacinaceæ, typified by the genus Icacina. The members are evergreen tropical or subtropical trees and shrubs. Villaresia Congonha of Brazil is the congonha or gongonha from which a kind of maté is made.

icaco (ē-kä'kō), n. [W. Ind.] The cocoa-plum, Chrysobalanus Icaco, a native of Florida and the West Indies. It is a shrub 4 to 6 feet high, with fruit about the size of a plum, which is white, yellow, red, or purple in color. It forms a favorite conserve in the West Indies.

-ical. [< L. -ic-al-is, more common in NL.: see -ic and -al.] A compound adjective termination, usually equivalent to the simple -ic, as hysteric, hysterical, but often slightly differentiated, as in comic, comic-al, historic, historic-al, politic, politic-al. When the form in -ic is used chiefly or exclusively as a noun (either in singular or in plural form), the adjective is regularly in -ic-al: as, critic, critic-al, music, music-al, logic, logic-al, politics, politic-al, etc. Adverbs formed from adjectives regularly ending in -ic, but which may have -ical, regularly take -al- before -ly: as, graphic, graphic-al-ly; intrinsic, intrinsic-al-ly. See -ic and -al.

Icarian (ī-kā'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. Icarius, Gr. Ἰκάριος, pertaining to Icarus (L. Icaria, Gr. Ἰκαρία, Icaria), < Ἴκαρος, Icarus in Greek legend, a son of Dædalus: see def.] I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to Icarus, the son of Dædalus, who, to escape the wrath of Minos, is fabled in Greek legend to have fled from Crete with his father on wings fastened on with wax. In defiance of his father's warning, he flew too high; the sun melted the wax, and he fell into the Ægean sea, between the Cyclades and Caria, hence known as the Icarian sea; hence applied to any foolhardy or presumptuous exploit or enterprise.

> High-bred thoughts disdain to take their flight,
> But on th' Icarian wings of babbling fame.
> Quarles, Emblems, i. 9.

2. (a) Relating to Icarus or Icaria, now Nikaria, an island in the Icarian sea, near Samos. (b) Of or relating to Icaria, a deme of Attica occupying a valley behind Pentelicus, noted as the home of Thespis, the reputed founder of Greek tragedy, and as the traditional birthplace of the drama and of the cult of Dionysus in Attica.—3. Pertaining or relating to Icaria, an imaginary country where an ideally perfect communism prevailed, described in the work "Voyage to Icaria" (Voyage en Icarie), published by the French communist Étienne Cabet in 1840; pertaining or relating to the principles set forth in this work. An Icaria was established by Cabet and a few hundred followers in 1849 at Nauvoo in Illinois (after a failure in Texas in 1848), which, after some dissensions and divisions, was removed to Adams county, Iowa, in 1860. Another community was established in Sonoma county, California, in 1881, under the name of Icaria-Speranza. Their number has always been small.

> The Icarian system is as nearly as possible a pure democracy. The president, elected for a year, is simply an executive officer to do the will of the majority.
> Nordhoff, Communistic Societies of the U. S.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Icaria.—2. A follower of the communist Cabet; a settler in an Icarian commune.

> The Icarians reject Christianity; but they have adopted the communistic idea as their religion. This any one will see who speaks with them. But devotion to this idea has supported them under the most deplorable poverty and long-continued hardship for twenty years.
> Nordhoff, Communistic Societies of the U. S.

Icarianism (ī-kā'ri-an-izm), n. [< Icarian + -ism.] The communistic system described by Étienne Cabet as existing in Icaria (see Icarian, a., 3), and advocated by him.

> The apostles of Icarianism should, like Christ, whose principles they were only carrying out, convert the world by teaching, preaching, writing, discussing, persuading, and by setting good examples.
> R. T. Ely, French and German Socialism, p. 50.

icary†, n. [< Russ. ikra, dial. ikro (= Pol. Serv. OBulg. ikra = Bohem. jikra = Lith. ikrai = Lett. ikra = Hung. ikra), roe, caviar.] Caviar.

> Of the Roes of these foure kinds they make very great store of Icary or Caueary. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 479.

icchet, v. i. An obsolete spelling of itch. Chaucer.

iccle, n. See ickle[1].

ice (īs), n. [Now spelled with c as if of F. origin (see -ce[2]), but prop., as often in early mod. E., with s, ise, < ME. ise, is, ys, < AS. īs (= OFries. īs = D. ijs = MLG. īs = OHG. MHG. īs, G. eis = Icel. īss = Sw. is = Dan. is = Goth. eis* (not recorded), ice. sarn; but evidence is lacking: see iron.] 1. The solid form of water, produced by freezing. It is a brittle, transparent solid, with a refractive index of 1.3. Water, under ordinary conditions, begins to freeze at 32° F. (0° C.), and in freezing expands by about $\frac{1}{11}$ of its bulk, exerting a great force against any surface by which it is confined. The specific gravity of ice is 0.918, and hence it floats on the water with about $\frac{9}{10}$ of its volume submerged. The temperature of freezing is lowered .0075° C. for every atmosphere of pressure. Freezing is retarded by substances in solution; thus, seawater freezes at about 27° F. (−3° C.). Ice is produced in unlimited quantities by the processes of nature in cold climates. It may also be made artificially by ice-machines of various kinds. See ice-machine.

His wijf walked him with, with a longe gode . . .

Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 436.

I finde no peace and yet mie warre is done,
I feare and hope, and burne and freese like ise.
Wyatt, quoted in Puttenham's Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 102.

The cold brook,
Candied with ice. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

The high rocks which surround the snug little bathing cove made the water as cold as ice.
Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. i.

2. Same as icing.—3. A frozen confection consisting (a) of sweetened and flavored cream, milk, or custard (cream-ice, ice-cream), or (b) of the sweetened juice of various fruits (water-ice).—Anchor ice. See anchor-ice.—Block ice, ice cut or made artificially in blocks, for commercial and domestic uses.

The cost of producing clear block ice in this country.
Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8781.

Ice age, the period, more generally designated as the glacial epoch (see glacial), during which there was a much more extensive development of ice over certain portions of the earth's surface than there is at the present time. It is generally supposed that the glacial epoch occurred in post-Tertiary times, but some geologists maintain that there have been numerous repetitions of this condition.—Ice system, a system of glaciers radiating from one common center or ice-cap: a term used by some geologists to distinguish regions where the glaciation has diverged from several independent centers from those where it has all moved in one direction, and in the main independently of the topographical features of the country.

Under such circumstances, Wales, Scotland, and Scandinavia must have had their own ice-systems.
Bonney, Abstract of Proc. Geol. Soc. of London, [Session 1875–76.

Inland ice. See ice-cap, 1.—Sailing ice, ice loosened from a pack, and scattered by the wind.—To break the ice. See break.—Young ice, in arctic regions, ice recently formed, in contradistinction to that which has been formed in a previous winter.

The winter floes seemed fixed, and for three days we had not moved, while the young ice, steadily forming, was from four to six inches in thickness.
A. W. Greely, Arctic Service, p. 123.

ice (īs), v. t.; pret. and pp. iced, ppr. icing. [= MD. ijsen, D. ijzen = MLG. isen, break ice, = OHG. īsēn, MHG. īsen, G. eisen, ice, freeze, = Icel. īsa, freeze, = Dan. ise = Sw. isa, ice; cf. Dan. isne, chill, run cold; from the noun.] 1. To cover with ice; convert into ice; freeze.

'Tis chrystal, friend, ic'd in the frozen sea.
P. Fletcher, Piscatory Eclogues, v. 11.

This sight hath stiffen'd all my operant powers,
Ic'd all my blood, benumb'd my motion quite.
Webster, Appius and Virginia, v. 3.

2. To apply ice to; refrigerate; preserve in ice, as meat.—3. To cover with concreted sugar; frost.

-ice. [< ME. -ice, -ise, -is, < OF. F. -ice = Sp. -icio, m., -icia, f., = Pg. -iço, m., -iça, f., -ice, -ise, m. and f., = It. -izio, m., -izia, f., < L. -i-tiu-s, m., -i-ti-a, f., -i-tiu-m, n.: see -ce[3].] A particular form (including the stem-vowel -i-) of the termination -ce, of Latin origin, as in avarice, justice, malice, notice, service, novice, etc.; also in words of later formation, as in cowardice. In practice the termination is historically a feminine form of -ic.

ice-anchor (īs'ang″kor), n. Naut., an anchor with one arm, used for securing a vessel to a floe of ice.

The ordinary ice-anchor was a large iron hook bent nearly at a right angle, with a point to be inserted in a hole in the ice.
Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 155.

ice-apron (īs'ā″prun), n. An ice-breaker or

Portion of Bridge over the Yssel, Holland, showing ice-aprons (a, a, a) on the bank and in mid-stream.

starling placed on the up-stream side of a bridge-pier to protect it from moving ice.

ice-auger (īs'â″gėr), n. An implement for boring ice, in ice-fishing, which has superseded the ordinary ice-chisel. It bores a 6-inch hole, cutting out a plug of ice of that diameter.

ice-ax (īs'aks), n. An ax for cutting or cleaving ice; especially, an ax used by alpine guides and alpinists generally for cutting steps in making the ascent of steep ice-slopes. The ax is carried sometimes as a part of the alpenstock, and sometimes as an entirely separate implement. The forms in use are much varied.

ice-bag (īs'bag), n. A caoutchouc bag for holding broken ice when used as a cold application in surgical treatment, especially for the eye, spine, etc.

ice-banner (īs'ban″ėr), n. See ice-feathers.

ice-beam (īs'bēm), n. Naut., a plank or beam used to strengthen the stem and bows of ships when exposed to the concussion and pressure of ice.

ice-bearer (īs'bār″ėr), n. In physics, a cryophorus.

ice-belt (īs'belt), n. Same as ice-foot.

On regaining the seaboard, the same frowning cliffs and rock-covered ice-belt that we had left greeted us.
Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 96.

★iceberg (īs'bėrg), n. [= D. ijsberg = G. eisberg; adapted from Scand., < Sw. Norw. isberg = Dan. isbjerg, lit. 'ice-hill': see ice and berg[2] (berg[2] in E. is due to the compound ice-berg).] A large floating mass of ice detached from a glacier at the sea-level. The movement of the glacier downward causes it to protrude into the sea, by which it is in part supported until the weight becomes so great that more or less of it breaks off, often with great noise and commotion of the sea. This process is called calving. The portion detached from the glacier floats about, driven by winds and currents, and is an iceberg. This is the mode of formation of the best-known bergs—those which often encumber a part of the North Atlantic in spring and early summer, having come down from the ice-clad plateaus of Greenland. The more or less completely frozen surface of the water in the northern polar region is known as pack-ice, or simply pack, floe-ice, floe, and floe-berg. (See floe and floe-berg.) Many icebergs of the Antarctic Ocean are of tabular form and of great size, being portions of the antarctic ice-sheet.

iceberger (īs'bėr″gėr), n. One who has had ★experience of icebergs. N. E. D.

ice-bird (īs'bėrd), n. The little auk or sea-dove, Mergulus alle, or Alle nigricans. See cut under dovekie.

ice-blink (īs'blingk), n. [= Dan. Norw. Sw. isblink, G. eisblink.] A peculiar twinkle in the air near the horizon caused by the reflection of sunlight from the surface of an ice-pack or floating mass of ice, or from land covered with snow.

An ice-blink all along the horizon to leeward, indicating the situation of the pack.
R. M'Cormick, Arc. and Antarc. Voyages, I. 272.

ice-boat (īs'bōt), n. 1. A strong boat, propelled by steam, used to break a channel through ice.—2. A triangular or boat-shaped frame mounted on runners, and fitted with a mast, sails, etc., for sailing on ice. Two of the runners are placed at the ends of a runner-plank extending across the frame at the point of its greatest beam, and the third is carried on a pivot at the stern and serves as a rudder.

ice-bone (īs'bōn), n. One of the numerous variants of aitchbone.

ice-bound (īs'bound), a. Obstructed by ice; frozen in; surrounded or hemmed in by ice, so as to prevent progress or approach: as, an ice-bound ship; ice-bound coasts.

ice-box (īs'boks), n. 1. An ice-chest; a small refrigerator.—2. The compartment in a refri-★gerator or an ice-chest for containing the ice.

ice-breaker (īs'brā″kėr), n. 1. A structure of masonry or timber (as a pier or row of piles) for the protection of bridge-piers or of vessels in dock from moving ice.—2. An ice-boat for breaking channels through ice in a river or harbor.—3. The bowhead, or great polar whale, Balæna mysticetus: a whalers' name.

ice-brook (īs'brůk), n. An ice-cold brook or stream. "The allusion [in the extract] is to the ancient Spanish custom of hardening steel by plunging it red-hot in the rivulet Salo near Bilbilis [now Calatayud in Aragon]." (Schmidt.) [Rare.]

I have another weapon in this chamber,
It is a sword of Spain, the ice-brook's temper.
Shak., Othello, v. 2.

ice-built (īs'bilt), a. Built or composed of ice.

Where shaggy forms o'er ice-built mountains roam.
Gray, Progress of Poesy.

ice-calorimeter (īs'kal-ō-rim″e-tėr), n. See calorimeter.

ice-canoe (īs'ka-nö″), n. A boat with a very broad flat keel shod with iron runners, so that it can be drawn readily over the ice: intended for use on partly frozen lakes and rivers.

ice-cap (īs'kap), n. 1. A general or continuous permanent covering of a certain area of land, whether large or small, with snow, névé, or ice, especially in the arctic regions. The continuous covering with snow and névé of the higher and larger part of Greenland is sometimes called the ice-cap, but more generally the inland ice.

A decided ice-cap was observed above the land at Newman Bay, also one inshore of Cape Britannia, far away towards the north-east.
Nares, Voyage to the Polar Sea, II. 72.

2. In therap., a rubber bag containing ice for application to the head.

ice-chair (īs'chār), n. A chair set on runners like a sled, in which a person is propelled on the ice, usually by a skater.

ice-chest (īs'chest), n. A form of domestic ice-chamber having apartments for the ice and the provisions, the food-chamber being cooled by air conducted to it from the ice-box, or by the cold side of the latter, which forms a part of the inclosure of the food-chamber; a refrigerator. See refrigerator.

ice-chisel (īs'chiz″el), n. A long-handled chisel-pointed tool used in harvesting ice: a tool for cutting holes in ice.

The ice-chisel, . . . called by the Eskimos too'-oke.
Science, IV. 82.

ice-claw (īs'klâ), n. An appliance for grappling blocks of ice; ice-tongs.

Ice-claw.

ice-closet (īs'kloz″et), n. A large refrigerator, or a small room for cold storage.

ice-cold (īs'kōld), a. [< ME. iscold,* < AS. is-ceald (= D. ijskoud = G. eiskalt = Dan. iskold, Sw. iskall), < is, ice, + ceald, cold.] 1. Cold as ice; extremely cold.—2. In pathol., experiencing a morbid sensation of cold, compared by the patient to that which would be produced by the application of ice. Dunglison.

ice-cream (īs'krēm'), n. [Strictly iced cream.] A confection made by congealing variously flavored cream or custard in a vessel surrounded with a freezing-mixture.

The Deacon, not being in the habit of taking his nourishment in the congealed state, had treated the ice-cream as a pudding of a rare species.
O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, vii.

Ice-cream fork, a small table-fork, broad and with short tines, for eating ice-cream.—Ice-cream freezer, an apparatus for making ice-cream, consisting of a can or metallic vessel plunged in a tub or cylindrical casing filled with broken ice and salt. The contents of the vessel are stirred or whirled about by means of a dasher, or by rotation.—Rock ice-cream. Same as granite, 2.

ice-crusher (īs'krush″ėr), n. A device for ★grinding or crushing ice.

iced (īst), p. a. 1. Covered with ice; converted into ice; frozen.—2. Cooled with ice; very cold: as, iced tea; iced wine.—3. Covered with concreted sugar; frosted: as, iced cake.—4. In bot., covered with particles like icicles.

ice-drift (īs'drift), n. Masses of loose or floating ice.

The strait was already filled with ice-drift.
Motley, United Netherlands, III. 557.

ice-drops (īs'drops), n. pl. In bot., transparent processes resembling icicles.

ice-elevator (īs'el″ē-vā-tor), n. A hoisting-apparatus for lifting blocks of ice from the water to the ice-house. The most common form is an inclined plane extending from under the water to the top gallery of the ice-house. On the incline travel two endless chains, with bars joining them at intervals. Cakes of ice floated up to the foot of the elevator are caught by these bars and dragged up the incline. Arrangements are also made for diverting the ice to any level of the house. Another form, sometimes called an ice-screw, consists of an inclined plane in the form of a spiral. In the well of the spiral is an upright shaft having radial arms; as the shaft revolves these engage the blocks of ice, and push them up the spiral incline to the ice-house.

Ice-elevator.

ice-escape (īs′es-kāp″), n. An apparatus consisting of poles and ropes for rescuing persons who have broken through the ice.

A number of sledge-chairs and an ice-escape were conveyed to the place of amusement.
Illus. London News, Jan. 9, 1864.

ice-fall (īs′fâl), n. 1. The dislodgment and fall of masses from a glacier, or from a floating iceberg.

And then the ice-fall with its ringing, rumbling, crashing roar, and the heavy, explosionlike voice of the final plunge, followed by the wild, frantic dashing of the waters.
New York Independent, April 22, 1862.

2. A glacier. [Poetical.]

Ye ice-falls! ye that from the mountain's brow
Adown enormous ravines slope amain. . . .
Motionless torrents! silent cataracts!
Coleridge, Hymn in the Vale of Chamouni.

ice-feathers (īs′feᵀᴴ″ėrz), n. pl. Peculiar feather-like forms assumed by ice, occasionally seen on and near the summits of high mountains, and especially on Mount Washington in New Hampshire. Under certain exceptional conditions of the weather the surface at times becomes covered with a considerable thickness of ice, parts of which assume a more or less distinctly marked feathery appearance. This feathery incrustation manifests itself especially on the edges of rocks, buildings, and projections of all kinds, from which elongated masses of crystals sometimes project with slight fan-like divergence for a distance of two or three feet, pointing in the direction from which the wind was blowing at the time of their formation. This phenomenon has been called frost-feathers, frostwork, and icework; and those who have observed it as exhibited on Lassen's Peak in California have named it ice-banner.

ice-fern (īs′fėrn), n. A fern-like incrustation of ice or hoar frost produced on the glass of windows by the freezing of insensible moisture.

Fine as ice-ferns on January panes.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

ice-field (īs′fēld), n. A great sheet or floe of ice, at times so extensive in arctic seas that its limits cannot be seen from the masthead.

The final breaking up of the ice in the Missouri was one of excitement to us. The roar and crash of the ice-fields could be heard a great distance.
E. B. Custer, Boots and Saddles, p. 229.

ice-fishing (īs′fish″ing), n. The act or method of fishing through holes cut in the ice, usually with hook and line. The most common mode of ice-fishing is by means of the tilter or tilt-up. See tilter.

ice-float (īs′flōt), n. Same as ice-floe.

ice-floe (īs′flō), n. [= Dan. isflage, isflag = Norw. isflak, isflake, isflok = Sw. isflake, < is, ice, + flage, Norw. flake, floe: see ice and flake[1], flaw[1], floe.] A large sheet of floating ice.

ice-foot (īs′fůt), n. A belt of ice, in northern seas, built up chiefly by the accumulation of the autumn snowfall, which becomes converted into ice when it meets the sea-water, and thus forms a solid wall from the bottom of the sea upward, increasing in height as the snow accumulates. The upper surface is level with the top of high water, and the bottom of the ice-cliff is at the low-water level. Also called ice-belt, ice-ledge, and ice-wall.

The separation of the true ice-foot from our floe was at first a simple interval, which by the recession and advance of the tides gave a movement of about six feet to our brig.
Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 162.

The usual mode of travel is by dog-sleds along the ice-foot which everywhere skirts the land.
Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 200.

ice-fork (īs′fôrk), n. A three-tined fork of special pattern, used for picking ice into fragments before it is ground fine in an ice-crusher. Such a fork, as used in the fisheries, has tapering tines about 1 inch wide and from 6 to 9 inches long, united above, and fitted with a socket for a wooden handle 4 or 5 feet long.

ice-fox (īs′foks), n. The isatis or arctic fox, Vulpes lagopus.

ice-glass (īs′glȧs), n. Same as crackle-glass.

ice-gull (īs′gul), n. 1. The glaucous gull or burgomaster, Larus glaucus. See cut under burgomaster.—2. The ivory-gull. Coues.

ice-hill (īs′hil), n. [< ice + hill[1], translating iceberg, q. v.] Same as iceberg. [Rare.]

ice-hook (īs′hůk), n. 1. A hook attached to a pole, used in moving blocks of ice.—2. A small ice-anchor.

ice-house (īs′hous), n. [= Dan. ishus; as ice + house[1].] A structure, usually with double walls, packed between with sawdust or some similar non-conducting material, used for the storage of ice. It usually incloses a pit or well, which has a drain to carry off the water resulting from the melting of the ice. A year's supply of ice for private use is often kept in a small ice-house constructed on this principle, sometimes partly or wholly underground. Ice-houses for supplying the trade in ice are commonly placed close to a lake or stream, and fitted with elevators and other appliances for gathering, storing, and shipping the ice. The term is sometimes, but less properly, applied to cold-storage rooms and large refrigerators.

Considering at how little expense and trouble an ice-house can be constructed, it is surprising that any respectable habitation in the country should not have one attached to it.
Ure, Dict., II. 878.

Icel. An abbreviation of Icelandic.

Iceland† (īs′land), n. [Also Island; abbr. of Iceland dog, q. v.] An Iceland dog.

Our water-dogs and Islands here are shorn,
White hair of women here so much is worn.
Drayton, Mooncalf.

Iceland crystal. See crystal.

Iceland cur† (īs′land kėr). Same as Iceland dog. Erroneously, Isling cur.

Hang hair like hemp, or like the Isling curs;
For never powder, not the crisping iron,
Shall touch these dangling locks.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 1.

Iceland dog† (īs′land dog). [Also Iseland (Island, Isling) dog (or cur), also simply Iceland (Island, etc.); supposed to have been brought from Iceland.] A sort of shaggy, sharp-eared white dog, formerly imported, or supposed to be imported, from Iceland as a lap-dog.

Pish for thee, Iceland dog! thou prick-eared cur of Iceland.
Shak., Hen. V., ii. 1.

Use and custome hath intertained other dogges of an outlandishe kinde, but a few, and the same beying of a pretty bygnesse; I meane Iseland dogges, curled and rough all over, which by reason of the lenght of their heare make showe neither of face nor of body. And yet these curres forsoothe, because they are so strange, are greatly set by, esteemed, taken up, and made of, many times in the roome of the spaniell gentle or comforter.
A. Fleming, tr. of Caius on English Dogs (1576). (Nares.)

Icelander (īs′lan-dėr), n. [= Dan. Islænder, Sw. Isländer (Icel. Islendingr); as Iceland (< ME. Island, Islond, < Icel. Island (Sw. and Dan. Island = D. Ijsland = G. Island), < iss, ice, + land, land: so called by the first Scandinavian explorers, from the polar ice which filled the fiords) + -er[1].] A native or an inhabitant of Iceland.

Iceland falcon, gull. See falcon, gull.

Icelandic (īs-lan′dik), a. and n. [< NL. Islandicus; the analogical E. form would be Icelandish* = Icel. Íslenzkr = Sw. Dan. Islandsk.]

I. a. Pertaining to Iceland, a large island belonging to Denmark, in the northernmost part of the Atlantic ocean, east of Greenland.

II. n. The language of the Icelanders or of their literature. It is the oldest and best-preserved member of the Scandinavian branch of the Teutonic family of languages. In its older form, called Old Norse, it stands as the type of the general Scandinavian speech as first recorded (tenth and eleventh centuries), of which Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish are the modern continental forms. Modern Icelandic dates from the Reformation; it preserves in great part the external form of the Old Icelandic, with considerable changes in pronunciation and vocabulary. Many important historical, poetical, theological, and other works have been written in Icelandic, from the tenth century to the present time. Abbreviated Icel.

Iceland moss, spar, etc. See the nouns.

ice-leaf (īs′lēf), n. Mullen, Verbascum Thapsus.

ice-ledge (īs′lej), n. Same as ice-foot.

ice-leveler (īs′lev″el-ėr), n. An implement used in clearing and cleaning the surface of ice previous to sawing and gathering.

ice-loon (īs′lön), n. The great northern diver, Colymbus glacialis or torquatus.

ice-machine (īs′ma-shēn″), n. A machine for the artificial production of ice. Ice-machines are based on one or the other of two general principles, or on a combination of the two, namely, the principle of the absorption of the latent heat of vaporization or of liquefaction from surrounding or contiguous bodies by substances which evaporate or liquefy at low temperatures, and the principle of the conversion of heat into work by the expansion of previously compressed and cooled gas or vapor, in such manner that the work performed is expended upon another isolated volume of the same material which this work assists in compressing for subsequent use in expansion. The prime mover is usually a steam-engine. The compressed gas or vapor is led into and expanded in a cylinder like that of a steam-engine. In machines employing compressed air, the air is first compressed in and discharged from a compressor cylinder into a receiver. The work of compression is thereby converted into heat in the compressed air. This heat is taken out of the air by various methods, water at ordinary temperatures being generally used for this cooling. The air is next inducted to an engine-cylinder, wherein it acts, first at full pressure and then expansively, against a piston so connected that, during the period of expansion, outer work is performed at the expense of the heat remaining in the air at the beginning of this period. Heat is thus converted into work, and the temperature of the air passed out of the cylinder is greatly reduced. The cold air is generally passed into a system of pipes surrounded by a saline solution which resists freezing at very low temperatures, and this solution, so refrigerated, is used to freeze water in metal molds set in the cold brine. In ice-cream manufacture the mutual liquefaction of ice and salt takes place at 0° F. when these substances are mixed in proper proportions, and the latent heat of this liquefaction being extracted from the cream, the latter freezes. Ether, ammonia, and sulphur dioxid are the most important substances used in machines which operate upon the first principle. By cooling and compression these substances liquefy. They are then allowed to evaporate and seize heat from saline solutions, which are utilized for ice-making as above described, or which are pumped through systems of piping for cooling storage- and fermenting-rooms. Anhydrous ammonia has proved most efficient for ice-machines, and is now more used than any other material. See refrigerating-machine, under refrigerate.

ice-mallet (īs′mal″et), n. A mallet used by fishermen and others to break or crush ice.

iceman (īs′man), n.; pl. icemen (-men). 1. A man skilled in traveling upon ice.

The actual deposit of ice upon our decks would have tried the nerves of the most experienced icemen.
Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 76.

The glacier [des Bois] maintains this wild and chaotic character for some time; and the best iceman would find himself defeated in an attempt to get along it.
Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 41.

2. One who is engaged in the industry of gathering and storing ice for commercial or domestic uses; a dealer in ice; also, one who distributes ice to customers.

ice-mark (īs′märk), n. In geol., a scratch, groove, or polished surface produced by glacial action or left by a moving mass of ice; any indication of the former presence of ice.

ice-master (īs′mȧs″tėr), n. A pilot or seaman of experience, employed to assist in navigating through ice in the Arctic ocean.

ice-mountain (īs′moun″tạn), n. Same as iceberg.

Thus are these amazing icemountains launched forth to sea, and found floating in the waters round both poles.
Goldsmith, Hist. Earth (ed. 1790), I. 247.

ice-pack (īs′pak), n. A great field of ice, consisting of separate masses packed together or lying closely adjacent to one another, as in the arctic seas.

ice-pail (īs′pāl), n. A pail or bucket intended to be filled with ice for cooling wine in bottles or decanters. Such a vessel is sometimes made of fine material, as porcelain, is fitted with a lining, cover, etc., and may serve as an ornament for a sideboard.

"This is as it should be," said I, looking round at the well-filled table and the sparkling spirits immersed in the ice-pails.
Bulwer, Pelham, xvii.

ice-paper (īs′pā″pėr), n. Very thin, transparent gelatin in sheets, for copying drawings. Also called papier glacé.

ice-pick (īs′pik), n. A small hand-tool, shaped like an awl, used for breaking ice.

ice-pit (īs′pit), n. A pit dug in the ground, lined with some non-conducting material, and used for the storage and preservation of ice.

ice-pitcher (īs′pich″ėr), n. A pitcher for holding iced water, often made of metal, with double or non-conducting walls.

ice-plane (īs′plān), n. 1. In ice-harvesting, an implement used in removing roughnesses and irregularities from the surface of ice that is to be cut. It is drawn by horses.—2. A tool for removing snow-ice from the surfaces of ice-blocks before storing them.—3. An instrument for shaving ice from the lump or block for use in the preparation of cooling drinks, etc.

ice-plant (īs′plant), n. A plant, Mesembryanthemum crystallinum, belonging to the family Aizoaceæ. It is sprinkled throughout with pellucid watery vesicles which shine like pieces of ice, and is indigenous in Greece, the Canary Islands, and the Cape of Good Hope; in the Canaries large quantities of the plant are collected and burned, and the ashes are sent to Spain for use in glass-making. It is frequently cultivated. Also called dew-plant. The name ice-plant is also applied to Crassula falcata of the Crassulaceæ, but less commonly. Monotropa uniflora is sometimes called the American ice-plant, from its white, transparent color.

ice-plow (īs′plou), n. An implement for cutting grooves in ice, to divide it into blocks of the right size for harvesting. It is a very narrow plane (practically, a saw) with a series of blades in line, each blade being usually a little longer than the one before it. It is usually made with a marker that serves to indicate the position of the next cut, or with a guide that travels in the last cut made by the plow. Sometimes called an ice-cutter, or, if for thin ice, or to make only a slight cut and to be followed by a heavier blow, an ice-marker.

Ice-plows.

a, plow for cutting three parallel grooves in moderately thick ice; b, plow with five shares following in the same groove, for cutting deep ice; c, ice-plow or -cutter with guide.

ice-poultice (īs′pōl″tis), n. In med., a poultice made by filling a bag or bladder with pounded ice; an ice-bag.

ice-quake (īs′kwāk), n. [< ice + quake, after earthquake.] The rending and crashing which precede the breaking up of floes of ice.

icer (ī′sėr), n. One who ices; specifically, in the fisheries, one who ices fresh fish in the hold of a vessel.

ice-river (īs′riv″ėr), n. A fanciful or poetical name for a glacier.

It is indubitable that an ice-river . . . once flowed through the vale of Hasli.
Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 146.

ice-saw (īs′sâ), n. A large saw used for cutting through the ice to free ships which have been ★frozen in, or for cutting ice in blocks for storage.

ice-scraper (īs′skrā″pėr), n. An implement for cleaning snow and dirt from the surface of ice before cutting and storing it.

ice-screw (īs′skrö), n. See ice-elevator.

ice-sheet (īs′shēt), n. A glacial covering or ice-cap extending over a large area of country, as that which is believed by many geologists to have covered much of eastern North America during the glacial period.

An epoch in which the retreating icesheet still occupied the St. Lawrence valley. The American, X. 316.

ice-ship (īs′ship), n. A ship fitted for passage through ice.

The first [sealers] are distinctively ice-ships.
Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 113.

ice-spade (īs′spād), n. A hand-tool used in harvesting ice, to separate the blocks partly cut by the ice-plow.

Ice-spade or -chisel.

ice-spar (īs′spär), n. A variety of glassy feldspar, the crystals of which resemble ice.

ice-stream (īs′strēm), n. 1. A more or less continuous belt or stream of ice-floes driven in a certain direction by wind or current, or both. It is the ice-stream which sweeps around Cape Farewell toward the north, bearing the last remains of the heavy floes formed originally in the polar sea, which is chiefly thus designated.

I found that we had run deeper into the ice-stream than I had intended, and was forced to haul out from five to ten miles farther away from the land.
Nares, Voyage to the Polar Sea, I. 8.

2. A stream-like glacier; a stream of slowly moving ice.

Near the village of Grindelwald, in the Bernese Oberland, there are two great ice-streams called respectively the upper and the lower Grindelwald glaciers.
Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 93.

ice-table (īs′tā″bl), n. A flat, horizontal mass of ice.

ice-tongs (īs′tôngz), n. pl. 1. Large iron nippers for handling ice.—2. Small tongs for taking up pieces of ice at table. They are generally made like sugar-tongs, but longer, and with larger claws or grapples.

ice-wall (īs′wâl), n. Same as ice-foot. Sometimes, however, an "ice-wall" is formed by the pressure of the pack, which throws masses of ice on to the shore and piles them up to a considerable height in the form of a solid wall. Some of the belts of ice which line the arctic shores are formed in part from the snow derived from the land, and in part from the sea-ice thrown upon the shore by the pressure of the pack.

I secured the ship to a small indentation of the ice-foot or ice-wall. Nares, Voyage to the Polar Sea, II. 115.

ice-water (īs′wâ″tėr), n. [In the second sense, strictly iced water.] 1. Water from melted ice.—2. Water cooled by ice; iced water.

ice-whale (īs′hwāl), n. The bowhead, or great polar whale, Balæna mysticetus: so called by whalemen because its habitat is among the scattered floes, or about the borders of the ice-fields or barriers.

ice-wool (īs′wûl), n. Same as eis-wool.

icework (īs′wėrk), n. See ice-feathers.

ice-worn (īs′wōrn), a. Bearing the marks of the former presence of ice; smoothed, polished, grooved, or scratched by the movement of masses of ice containing embedded detritus.

ice-yacht (īs′yot), n. An ice-boat.

ice-yachting (īs′yot″ing), n. Sailing with ice-yachts.

ice-yachtsman (īs′yots″man), n. One who sails in an ice-yacht.

ich[1†], pron. A form of I, the nominative of the first personal pronoun, in the southern dialect of early English, and occasionally found in the midland dialect.

ich[2†], a. and pron. A Middle English form of each.

ich dien (ich dēn). [< MHG. G. ich diene, ich dien, I serve: ich = AS. ic = E. I[2]; dienen, OHG. dionōn = OS. thionōn, serve, connected with OHG. deo = AS. theów = Goth. thius, m., OHG. diu = OS. thiwi, thiu = AS. theówe = Goth. thiwi, f., a female servant: see thew[2].] I serve. This was originally the motto of John of Luxemburg, King of Bohemia, who was killed at the battle of Crécy in France in 1346. It was adopted, together with his crest of three ostrich-feathers, by Edward the Black Prince, who served in that battle, and both have been retained by the Princes of Wales since.

ichiboo, ichibu (ē′chi-bö), n. [Jap., < ichi, one, + bú, a division, name of a coin.] See bu.

Ichneumia (ik-nū′mi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰχνεύμων, ichneumon; cf. ἴχνευμα, a track.] 1. An aberrant genus of African ichneumons or mungooses, of the subfamily Herpestinæ and family Viverridæ, having a long bushy tail and hairy soles. The type is I. leucura or albicauda. It is of dark-gray color, due to annulation of the hairs with black and white. St. Hilaire, 1837.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus: as, the white-tailed ichneumia.

ichneumon (ik-nū′mon), n. [< L. ichneumon, < Gr. ἰχνεύμων, an Egyptian animal which hunts out crocodiles' eggs, the ichneumon, Pharaoh's rat, lit. the 'tracker' (cf. ἴχνευμα, a track), < ἰχνεύειν, track or trace out, hunt after, < ἴχνος, a track or footstep.] 1. A carnivorous mammal, a kind of mungoose (Viverra ichneumon of Linnæus, now known as Herpestes ichneumon), found in Egypt, belonging to the subfamily Herpestinæ and family Viverridæ. It is of slender form, somewhat like that of the weasel tribe. The body is about 19 inches long, and of a grizzled brownish and yellowish color, due to the annulation of the hairs with different shades; the muzzle and paws are black, and the tail is tufted. It feeds on various small mammals, reptiles, or other animals, and has long been noted for devouring crocodiles' eggs, on which account it was held in great regard by the Egyptians. It is easily domesticated, and is useful in destroying vermin. Also called Pharaoh's rat.

Pharaoh's Rat (Herpestes ichneumon).

2. [cap.] A genus of herpestine viverrine mammals, containing the species I. pharaonis. See Herpestes. Lacépède, 1797.—3. In entom.: (a) [cap.] A Linnean genus of hymenopterous insects, formerly including most of the pupivorous or parasitic hymenopters, now restricted to certain species of ichneumon-flies which are regarded as typical of the genuine Ichneumonidæ. (b) A species of the genus Ichneumon or family Ichneumonidæ; an ichneumon-fly; a cuckoo-fly.

Ichneumones (ik-nū′mō-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Ichneumon, 3.] In entom., the ichneumon-flies or Ichneumonides. The group is divided into Ichneumones genuini and Ichneumones adsciti, which correspond respectively with the modern families Ichneumonidæ and Braconidæ.

ichneumon-fly (ik-nū′mon-flī), n. A cuckoo-fly or ichneumon. See Ichneumonidæ.

Ichneumonidæ (ik-nū-mon′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ichneumon + -idæ.] A family of Hymenoptera pupivora or parasitic hymenopters, established by Leach in 1817; the cuckoo-flies, ichneumon-flies, or ichneumons. The family was formerly much more extensive than it is now, having been restricted, by the exclusion of those ichneumons called Adsciti (see Braconidæ), to those which have two recurrent nerves in each fore wing. These insects were formerly called Muscæ tripiles, on account of the three threads which spring from the abdomen, and Muscæ vibrantes, from their habit of vibrating the antennæ. The genera and species are very numerous, over 3,000 species existing, it is said, in Europe alone. They are all parasitic on other insects, living usually as internal parasites. The abdomen is attached to the hinder extremity of the metathorax, between the bases of the posterior coxæ. The wings are veined, the anterior pair always exhibiting perfect cells. The ovipositor is straight and often exserted. The antennæ are usually thread-like, and are composed of more than 16 joints, with very few exceptions among the smaller species. The perfect insects feed solely on the juices of flowers. Some of them have a very long ovipositor, which is used to insert the eggs into the bodies of those caterpillars which live beneath the bark or in the crevices of wood; when not employed, this ovipositor is protected by two slender sheaths that inclose it on each side. Others, which have the ovipositor short, place their eggs in or upon the bodies of caterpillars of easier access; others again in the nests of wasps. See cuts under Cryptus, Ophion, and Pimpla.

ichneumonidan (ik-nū-mon′i-dąn), a. and n. I. a. Having the characters of the Ichneumonidæ.

II. n. An ichneumon-fly or ichneumonid.

ichneumoniform (ik-nū-mon′i-fôrm), a. [< L. ichneumon, ichneumon, + forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of an ichneumon-fly.

ichneumonized (ik-nū′mon-īzd), a. [< ichneumon + -ize + -ed[2].] In entom., infested with ichneumon parasites: applied to the larvæ of insects.

ichneumonology (ik-nū-mō-nol′ō-ji), n. [< ichneumon + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of entomology which is concerned with the study of ichneumon-flies.

ichneumous (ik-nū′mus), a. [< ichneum-on + -ous.] In entom., parasitic; having the habits of an ichneumon: said of insects which deposit their eggs in or on larvæ, as the Ichneumonidæ, Chalcididæ, and many others.

ichnite (ik′nīt), n. [< Gr. ἴχνος, a track, footstep, footprint, + -ite[2].] A fossil footprint; the fossilized track or trace of an animal: used mostly in compounds: as, ornithichnite, sauroidichnite, tetrapodichnite. See these words, and cut under footprint.

Ichnocarpus (ik-nō-kär′pus), n. [NL. (so called in ref. to the slender seed-vessel), < Gr. ἴχνος, a track, trace, + καρπός, fruit.] A name given by Robert Brown in 1809 to Quirivelia, a genus of climbing shrubs of the family Apocynaceæ. The species have opposite leaves, and flowers in branched terminal panicles. Quirivelia frutescens is ★sometimes used in India as a substitute for sarsaparilla.

ichnograph (ik′nō-gràf), n. [See ichnography.] In drawing, a ground-plan. E. H. Knight.

ichnographic (ik-nō-graf′ik), a. [< ichnography + -ic.] Pertaining to ichnography; describing a ground-plan.

ichnographical (ik-nō-graf′i-kąl), a. [< ichnographic + -al.] Same as ichnographic.

ichnography (ik-nog′rą-fi), n. [< L. ichnographia, < Gr. ἰχνογραφία, a tracing-out, a ground-plan, < ἴχνος, a track, trace, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The art of tracing ground-plans; the representation of a ground-plot, or of the site of an object on a horizontal plane.

Ichnography, by which we are to understand the very first design and ordinance of a work or edifice, together with every partition and opening drawn by rule and compass upon the area or floor, by artists often call'd the geometrical plan or plat-forme.
Evelyn, Architects and Architecture.

ichnolite (ik′nō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἴχνος, a track, footprint, + λίθος, a stone.] A stone presenting the impression of the foot of a fossil animal; a fossil footprint or ichnite. See cut under footprint.

Bones and teeth of the elephant and of the horse have also been found in the sandstone beds above the ichnolites.
Science, IV. 273.

ichnolithological (ik-nō-lith-ō-loj′i-kąl), a. Pertaining to ichnolithology; ichnological.

ichnolithology (ik″nō-li-thol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἴχνος, a track, footprint, + λίθος, a stone, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of ichnolites; ichnology.

ichnolitic (ik-nō-lit′ik), a. [< ichnolite + -ic.] Having the character of an ichnolite.

ichnological (ik-nō-loj′i-kąl), a. Pertaining to ichnology; ichnolithological.

ichnology (ik-nol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἴχνος, a track, footprint, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of paleontology which treats of fossil footprints; the science of fossil footprints; the study of those animals which are known only by their footprints.

ichor (ī'kôr), n. [= F. ichor = Sp. icor = Pg. ichor = It. icore, < NL. ichor, < Gr. ἰχώρ, juice, the blood of the gods, the serum of blood, lymph; cf. ἰκμάς, moisture, ἰκμαίνειν, wet.] 1. In Gr. and Rom. myth., an ethereal fluid believed to supply the place of blood in the veins of the gods.

Upon Diomedes wounding the Gods, there flow'd from the Wound an Ichor, or pure kind of Blood, which was not bred from Mortal Viands. Addison, Spectator, No. 333.

2. A thin, watery humor, like serum or whey; a thin, watery, acrid discharge from an ulcer, a wound, etc.

Long, snaky locks, stiff with loathsome ichor.
L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 412.

ichoræmia, n. See ichorrhæmia.

ichorose (ī'kō-rōs), a. [= F. ichoreux = Sp. It. icoroso; as ichor + -ose.] Full of ichor; ichorous.

ichorous (ī'kō-rus), a. [< ichor + -ous.] 1. Like ichor; thin; watery; serous.—2. Full of ichor; ichorose.

ichorrhæmia (ī-ko-rē'mi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰχώρ, ichor, + ῥεῖν, flow, + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., the condition of the blood when contaminated by absorption from a suppurating part. Also spelled ichoræmia.

ichth. An abbreviation of ichthyology.

ichthidin (ik'thi-din), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + -id- + *-in*².] A nitrogenous substance found in the eggs of cyprinoid fishes.

ichthin (ik'thin), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + *-in*².] The nitrogenous constituent of the eggs of cartilaginous fishes. It is closely allied to albumin.

ichthulin (ik'thū-lin), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + ὕλη, matter, + *-in*².] A constituent of the eggs of certain fishes, especially cyprinoids, containing 53.4 per cent. carbon, 7.6 hydrogen, 15.6 nitrogen, 0.4 sulphur, 0.4 phosphorus, and 0.1 iron.

ichthyic (ik'thi-ik), a. [< Gr. ἰχθυικός, of a fish, fishy, < ἰχθύς, a fish.] Pertaining to fishes; having the characters of a fish; ichthyomorphic; ichthyopsidan; piscine. R. Owen.

ichthyo-. [L., etc., < Gr. ἰχθυο-, combining form of ἰχθύς, a fish.] An element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'fish.'

Ichthyobus (ik-thī'ō-bus), n. See Ictiobus.

Ichthyocephali (ik″thi-ō-sef'ą-lī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + κεφαλή, head.] A group of physostomous fishes, founded by Cope (1870) as an order, including eels of the family Monopteridæ.

ichthyocephalous (ik″thi-ō-sef'ą-lus), a. Of or pertaining to the Ichthyocephali.

ichthyocol (ik'thi-ō-kol), n. Same as ichthyocolla.

ichthyocolla (ik″thi-ō-kol'ą), n. [L. (Pliny), < Gr. ἰχθυόκολλα, fish-glue, i. e. isinglass, also (in Pliny) the fish which produces it, < ἰχθύς, fish, + κόλλα, glue.] Fish-glue; isinglass. See isinglass.

ichthyocoprolite (ik″thi-ō-kop'rō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + κόπρος, dung, + λίθος, stone: see coprolite.] The fossilized excrement of a fish.

ichthyocoprus (ik″thi-ō-kop'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + κόπρος, dung.] Same as ichthyocoprolite.

Ichthyocrinidæ (ik″thi-ō-krin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Wachsmuth and Springer), < Ichthyocrinus + -idæ.] A family of articulate crinoids, typified by the genus Ichthyocrinus. They had small basal plates, the dorsal cup chiefly built up of radial plates of different orders, abutting laterally against one another or separated by interradials, and arms bifurcating and forming a wall continuous with the calyx. Most of them lived in the Devonian seas.

ichthyocrinoid (ik-thi-ok'ri-noid), n. A crinoid of the family Ichthyocrinidæ.

Ichthyocrinus (ik-thi-ok'ri-nus), n. [NL. (Conrad), < Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + κρίνον, lily (see crinoid).] An extinct genus of crinoids, typical of the family Ichthyocrinidæ.

ichthyodorulite (ik″thi-ō-dor'ō-līt), n. [Prop. ichthyodorylite*, < Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + δόρυ, a spear, + λίθος, a stone.] The fossilized spine of a fish or fish-like vertebrate. Ichthyodorulites are chiefly the spines which armed the front of the dorsal fins in selachians; but certain other extinct forms, named Acanthodidæ, had spines also on the anal, pectoral, and ventral fins. They are found in the greatest abundance in deposits of the Devonian epoch, and many of the fishes of that age are known only from such remains.

When, as in many cases, they [placoid forms of the exoskeleton] take the form of spines, these are called dermal defenses, and, in a fossil state, ichthyodorulites.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 111.

ichthyographic (ik″thi-ō-graf'ik), a. [< ichthyography + -ic.] Pertaining to ichthyography.

ichthyography (ik-thi-og'rą-fi), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The description of fishes; a treatise on fishes; descriptive ichthyology.

ichthyoid (ik'thi-oid), a. and n. [< Gr. ἰχθυοειδής, fish-like, < ἰχθύς, a fish, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Resembling a fish, or having the characters of a fish.

II. n. A member of the Ichthyopsida; any fish-like vertebrate. Huxley, 1863.

ichthyoidal (ik-thi-oi'dal), a. [< ichthyoid + -al.] Same as ichthyoid.

ichthyol (ik'thi-ol), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + -ol.] A clear, reddish-brown syrupy liquid with bituminous odor and taste, obtained by neutralizing ichthyosulphonic acid with ammonia; ammonium ichthyosulphonate. Used as an alterative and antiseptic.

ichthyolatrous (ik-thi-ol'ą-trus), a. [As ichthyolatry + -ous.] Of the nature of ichthyolatry; practising ichthyolatry; worshiping ichthyomorphic gods.

ichthyolatry (ik-thi-ol'ą-tri), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + λατρεία, worship.] Fish-worship; adoration of a fish-god. See *Dagon*².

ichthyolic (ik-thi-ol'ik), a. [< ichthyol + -ic.] Pertaining to or composed of ichthyol.

This is best met by using an ichthyolic ointment, or by painting on a zinc-ichthyol-gelatine preparation afterward.
Medical News, XLIX. 438.

ichthyolite (ik'thi-ō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + λίθος, stone.] A fossilized fish, or the cast of a fossil fish.

ichthyologic (ik″thi-ō-loj'ik), a. [< ichthyology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to ichthyology; related to ichthyology.

ichthyological (ik″thi-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< ichthyologic + -al.] Same as ichthyologic.

ichthyologically (ik″thi-ō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. As regards ichthyology.

ichthyologist (ik-thi-ol'ō-jist), n. [< ichthyology + -ist.] One who is versed in ichthyology.

ichthyology (ik-thi-ol'ō-ji), n. [= F. ichthyologie = Pg. ichthyologia = It. ictiologia, < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology. Cf. ἰχθυολογεῖν, speak of fish.] The science of fishes; that department of zoölogy which treats of fishes, with reference to their structure, relations to one another and to other animals, classification, habits, and uses. Abbreviated ichth.

ichthyomancy (ik'thi-ō-man-si), n. [< Gr. as if ἰχθυομαντεία*, < ἰχθυόμαντις, one who prophesies by means of fish, < ἰχθύς, a fish, + μάντις, a diviner.] Divination by means of the heads or the entrails of fishes.

ichthyomantic (ik″thi-ō-man'tik), a. [< Gr. ἰχθυόμαντις, one who prophesies by means of fish: see ichthyomancy.] Relating to ichthyomancy.

Ichthyomorpha (ik″thi-ō-môr'fą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + μορφή, form.] In Owen's system, an order of Amphibia, or a suborder of Batrachia, including the tailed batrachians. The term was contrasted with Ophiomorpha ★and Theriomorpha. It is equivalent to Urodela.

ichthyomorphic (ik″thi-ō-môr'fik), a. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + μορφή, form.] 1. In zoöl., having the characters of a fish, or morphologically related to fishes; ichthyopsidan.—2. In myth., formed like a fish, altogether or in part; partaking of the form or character of a fish: as, the ichthyomorphic gods of ancient Assyria and Syria. See *Dagon*².

ichthyopatolite (ik″thi-ō-pat'ō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + πάτος, a foot-path (see path), + λίθος, a stone.] The supposed fossil imprint of the pectoral fin-rays of a fish believed to have been able to move upon solid surfaces by means of these organs.

ichthyophagi, n. Plural of ichthyophagus.

ichthyophagist (ik-thi-of'ą-jist), n. [< ichthyophagy + -ist.] One who eats fish, or lives on a fish-diet.

ichthyophagous (ik-thi-of'ą-gus), a. [< NL. ichthyophagus, < Gr. ἰχθυοφάγος (also ἰχθυφάγος), eating fish, < ἰχθύς, fish, + φαγεῖν, eat.] Eating or subsisting on fish; fish-eating; piscivorous.

A wretched ichthyophagous people must make shocking soldiers, weak as water. De Quincey, Autobiog. Sketches.

ichthyophagus (ik-thi-of'a-gus), n.; pl. ichthyophagi (-jī). [NL.: see ichthyophagous.] One who eats fish; one who subsists on fish.

They are still Ichthyophagi, existing without any other subsistence but what the sea affords.
R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 144.

ichthyophagy (ik-thi-of'ą-ji), n. [< Gr. as if ἰχθυοφαγία*, the eating of fish, < ἰχθυοφάγος, eating fish: see ichthyophagous.] The practice of eating fish.

ichthyophthalmite (ik″thi-of-thal'mīt), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + ὀφθαλμός, eye, + *-ite*².] Fish-eye stone. See apophyllite.

Ichthyophthira (ik″thi-of-thī'rą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + φθείρ, a louse: see phthiriasis.] An order of degraded crustaceans parasitic upon fishes; the fish-lice. They have a suctorial mouth, no respiratory organs, reduced or rudimentary limbs, and external ovisacs in the female. Excluding some forms which have been included in this order, but which are referable to rhizocephalous cirripeds or elsewhere, the Ichthyophthira consist of the modern orders Siphonostoma and Lernæodea, the term being thus synonymous with Epizoa.

ichthyophthiran (ik″thi-of-thī'ran), a. and n. [< Ichthyophthira + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyophthira.

II. n. A fish-louse; one of the Ichthyophthira.

ichthyopodolite (ik″thi-ō-pod'ō-līt), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + ποῦς (ποδ-), = E. foot, + λίθος, stone.] A name given to fossil tracks or traces of uncertain character supposed to have been made by members of a hypothetical genus Ichthyopodolites. Buckland, 1844.

ichthyopsid (ik-thi-op'sid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyopsida. Also ichthyopsidan, ichthyopsidian.

The spinal accessory exists in no Ichthyopsid vertebrate.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 69.

II. n. A member of the Ichthyopsida. Also ichthyopsidan.

Ichthyopsida (ik-thi-op'si-dą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + ὄψις, appearance, view, + -ida.] One of three primary groups or provinces of vertebrates in Huxley's classification (the other two being Sauropsida and Mammalia), comprising the amphibians or batrachians and the fish and fish-like vertebrates; the branchiate or anamniotic Vertebrata. They have no amnion, and at most a rudimentary allantois, and breathe by gills during a part or the whole of life. They have urinary organs in the form of persistent Wolffian bodies; a tubular, bilocular, or at most a trilocular heart; never fewer than two aortic arches in the adult; nucleated blood-corpuscles; and no diaphragm, corpus callosum, or mammary glands. Also called Branchiata, Branchiotoca.

ichthyopsidan (ik-thi-op'si-dan), a. and n. Same as ichthyopsid.

There were two kinds of protovertebrates, namely piscine and reptilian, or ichthyopsidan and sauropsidan.
Nature, XXXV. 391.

ichthyopsidian (ik″thi-op-sid'i-an), a. Same as ichthyopsid.

Ichthyopterygia (ik-thi-op-te-rij'i-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + πτέρυξ (πτερυγ-), πτερύγιον, a wing or fin.] 1. An order of extinct reptiles; the ichthyosaurs. In Owen's classification of 1860 it is the third order of the class Reptilia, and in that of 1866 the fifteenth order of Hæmatocrya, or cold-blooded vertebrates, having a fish-like body, with a very short neck; limbs adapted for swimming, and with more than 5 many-jointed digits; numerous short, biconcave vertebræ, and no sacrum; the anterior ribs with bifurcate heads; episternum, clavicles, postorbital and supratemporal bones, and parietal foramen present; small maxillaries; long and large premaxillaries; the teeth confined to the maxillary, premaxillary, and premandibular bones, and implanted in a common alveolar groove; large orbits with a circle of sclerotic plates; and two small nostrils. See cuts under Ichthyosauria and Ichthyosaurus.

2. [l. c.] Plural of ichthyopterygium.

ichthyopterygian (ik-thi-op-te-rij'i-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyopterygia; ichthyosaurian.

II. n. One of the Ichthyopterygia; an ichthyosaur.

ichthyopterygium (ik-thi-op-te-rij'i-um), n.; pl. ichthyopterygia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + πτέρυξ (πτερυγ-), πτερύγιον, a wing or fin.] The free appendage of the scapular or pelvic girdle modified as a fin: contrasted with chiropterygium.

Ichthyornis victor.

Ichthyornidæ (ik-thi-ôr'ni-dē), n. pl. Same as Ichthyornithidæ.

Ichthyornis (ik-thi-ôr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A remarkable genus of birds, founded by Marsh (1872) upon remains from the pteranodon beds, of Cretaceous age, in Kansas: so called from the resemblance of the vertebræ to those of fishes. After Archæopteryx, of Jurassic age, Ichthyornis and Hesperornis are the most notable genera in ornithology; each furnishes a type of a primary division of the class Aves, and they are collectively known as Odontornithes, or birds with teeth. Ichthyornis represents the family Ichthyornithidæ and the order or subclass Odontotormæ, or birds with socketed teeth and biconcave vertebræ, yet with developed wings, ankylosed metacarpals, carinate sternum, and short coccyx, as in modern birds. I. dispar, the leading species, was about as large as a pigeon. Several other species are also described.

Ichthyornithes (ik-thi-ôr'ni-thēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Ichthyornis.] Those birds in which the vertebræ are biconcave, as the Ichthyornithidæ.

ichthyornithic (ik″thi-ôr-nith'ik), a. [As Ichthyornis (-nith-) + -ic.] Having the characters of birds together with certain characters of fishes; specifically, having the characters of the Ichthyornithidæ, especially biconcave vertebræ.

Ichthyornithidæ (ik″thi-ôr-nith'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ichthyornis (-nith-) + -idæ.] A family of fossil birds of the order Odontotormæ, typified by the genus Ichthyornis, having biconcave vertebræ and socketed teeth. Also Ichthyornidæ.

ichthyosarcolite (ik″thi-ō-sär'kō-līt), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + σάρξ (σάρκ-), flesh, + λίθος, a stone.] A fossil bivalve shell of the genus Caprinella, belonging to the family Hippuritidæ (or Rudistæ). Desmarest.

ichthyosaur (ik'thi-ō-sâr), n. [< Ichthyosaurus.] A fish-like saurian; a member of the order Ichthyosauria.

Ichthyosauria (ik″thi-ō-sâ'ri-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Ichthyosaurus.] An order of gigantic extinct marine fish-like Reptilia, having somewhat the shape of a cetacean mammal, with an enormous head, no obvious neck, and a tapering body, with four paddle-like flippers, and a broad homocercal tail-fin. The vertebræ are very short, biconcave, and peculiar in other respects (see the extract); the spinal column is without a sacrum, and is divisible only into caudal and precaudal regions, the former being distinguished by the presence of chevron-bones, the latter by the presence of ribs which do not articulate with the sternum. The order is the same as the Ichthyopterygia of Owen, but is named more conformably with some other orders of extinct reptiles. Also Ichthyosaura, Ichthyosauri.

Skull and Parts of the Skeleton of Ichthyosaurus intermedius.

A, skull: Fr, Ju, and La, frontal, jugal, and lacrymal bones; Mx, maxilla; Pmx, premaxilla; Prf, prefrontal; Pt, postfrontal; Pto, postorbital; N, nasal orifice. The following bones are also shown: Pa, parietal; Qj, quadratojugal; Qu, quadrate; Sq, squamosal; St, an anomalous bone called "temporal" by Cuvier, suggested as a stapes (columella of ear) by Huxley, or separate opisthotic. B, fore limb: H, humerus; R, radius; U, ulna; r, radiale; i, intermedium; u, ulnare; Cp, 1, 2, 3, 4, carpalia; Mc, i, ii, iii, iv, metacarpalia; Ph, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, phalanges; mr, mu, radial and ulnar marginal ossicles. C, a dorsal vertebra: C, centrum; NA, neural arch; R, rib; VO, ventral ossifications. D, hind limb: F, femur; Fb, fibula; T, tibia; t, tibiale; i, intermedium; f, fibulare; Ts, tarsalia; Mt, metatarsalia; Ph, phalanges; mtb, tibial marginal ossicles. E, pectoral arch, ventral aspect: Cl, clavicle; Icl, interclavicle; Co, coracoid; Sc, scapula. F, pelvic arch, ventral aspect: Il, ilium; Is, ischium; Pb, pubis.

The vertebræ of Ichthyosauria in general have certain characters by which they differ from those of all other Vertebrata. Not only are the centra flattened disks, very much broader and higher than they are long, and deeply biconcave, . . . but the only transverse processes they possess are tubercles developed from the sides of these centra; and the neural arches are connected with two flat surfaces, one on each side of the middle line of the upper surface of the vertebræ, by mere synchondroses.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 210.

ichthyosaurian (ik″thi-ō-sâ'ri-ąn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ichthyosauria; ichthyopterygian. Also ichthyosauroid.

II. n. One of the Ichthyosauria or Ichthyopterygia; an ichthyosaur.

Ichthyosauridæ (ik″thi-ō-sâ'ri-dē), n. pl. [< Ichthyosaurus + -idæ.] The ichthyosaurs as the typical family of Ichthyosauria. C. L. Bonaparte, 1831.

ichthyosauroid (ik″thi-ō-sâ'roid), a. Same as ichthyosaurian.

Ichthyosaurus (ik″thi-ō-sâ'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] 1. The typical genus of Ichthyosauridæ. I. communis is one of the earliest- and best-known species. — 2. [l. c.; pl. ichthyosauri (-rī).] A species of the genus Ichthyosaurus; an ichthyosaur.

Ichthyosaurus quadricissus. Quenst.
Skeleton showing outline of integument and dorsal and caudal fins. About one twentieth natural size. After E. Fraas. (From Zittel's "Palæontology.") ichthyosis (ik-thi-ō'sis), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + -osis.] In pathol., a congenital disease of the epidermis, in which it presents the form of hard dry scales and plates. Also called fish-skin disease.

ichthyotic (ik-thi-ot'ik), a. [< ichthyosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to, characterized by, or affected with ichthyosis.

The general health of ichthyotic subjects is usually good. Duhring, Skin Diseases, pl. F.

ichthyotomist (ik-thi-ot'ō-mist), n. [< ichthyotomy + -ist.] An ichthyological anatomist; a dissector of fishes.

It is called hypoglossal nerve by some ichthyotomists. Owen, Anat., viii.

ichthyotomy (ik-thi-ot'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. ἰχθύς, fish, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The anatomy or dissection of fishes. Owen.

ichthys (ik'this), n. [Gr. ἰχθύς, IΧΘΥΣ, lit. a fish, chosen as an emblem and motto because the order of its letters corresponds with the order of the initial letters of the words by which it is interpreted: 'Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ, 'Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour.'] A word found on many seals, rings, urns, tombstones, etc., belonging to the early period of Christianity, and supposed to have a mystical reference to the name and office of Jesus Christ. See the etymology.

-ician. [F. -icien, < ML. -ici-ān-us: see -ic and -ian.] A compound termination of Latin origin, forming nouns from adjectives in -ic or nouns in -ic, -ics: as, geometrician, logician, mathematician, physician, statistician, etc.

Icica (is'i-kä), n. [NL., from the Tupi name of the plant.] 1. A name given by Aublet in 1775 to Protium, a genus of plants, belonging to the family Balsameaceæ. The species are mostly large trees, natives of tropical regions and particularly of South America, some of them attaining a height of above 100 feet. Protium altissimum, the cedar-wood of Guiana, is preferred by the Indians for making canoes, on account not only of its great size, but of its durability. It is also esteemed by cabinet-makers as one of the best woods for bookcases, its odor preserving the books from insects. P. heptaphyllum is the hyawa tree or incense-wood of Guiana. It yields a fragrant balsam. P. Guianense yields the hyawa gum.

2. [l. c.] A resin obtained from a species of Icica (Protium). It is used for incense.

Icichthyinæ (i-sik-thi-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Icichthys + -inæ.] A subfamily of Icosteidæ, having the body covered with scales, and perfect ventral fins having one spine and five soft rays. Icichthys, the only genus, is represented by one species living in deep water off the Californian coast.

icichthyine (i-sik'thi-in), n. A fish of the subfamily Icichthyinæ.

Icichthys (i-sik'this), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. εἴκειν, yield, give way (cf. AS. wican, give way: see weak), + ἰχθύς, fish.] The typical genus of Icichthyinæ, with an imperfectly ossified or yielding skeleton.

icicle (ī'si-kl), n. [Early mod. E. also isicle, etc.; < ME. iseickle, isikel, isykle, yselel, iseyokel, isechel, iiseikkle, hyselhykylle, etc., < AS. īs-gicel (Leo) also īses (gen.) gicel (giccl), icicle, < īs, ice, + gicel, mod. E. dial. ickle, an icicle: see ickle[1]. The word is thus a compound of ice + ickle[1]. The latter element came to lose its independent meaning, and has suffered under popular etymology; explained in books as a mere dim. termination -icle, as in article, particle, etc., it appears transformed in the obs. or dial. forms ice-sickle, ise-sickle, ice-shackle, ice-shoggle, OSc. iceshogle, icechokill, etc.; = LG. is-jäkel, ishekel, icicle. Cf. MD. ijskekel, D. ijskegel (Norw. iskegle), and simply MD. kekel, keghel, D. kegel, icicle, merged in MD. keghel, D. kegel = G. kegel, a cone, ninepin, = Dan. kegle, skittle: see kail[2], keel[3]. The E. dial. ice-candle, icicle, is an independent formation; so MD. ijsdroppe, ijsdroppel, 'ice-drop,' G. eiszapfen = Dan. istap, 'ice-peg' (see tap[1]), etc.] 1. A pendent mass of ice tapering downward to a point, formed by the freezing of drops of water or other liquid flowing down from the place of attachment.

As men may se in wyntre
Ysekeles in eueses thorw hete of the sonne
Melteth in a mynut-while to myst and to watre.
Piers Plowman (B), xiii. 227.

Ghiacciuoli [It.], Ise-sickles, dropping ises. Florio.

Whether the evedrops fall,
Or if the secret ministry of frost
Shall hang them up in silent icicles.
Coleridge, Frost at Midnight.

2. In her., same as goutte or drop, but reversed, with the point downward. Compare gutté reversed, under gutté.

icicled (ī'si-kld), a. [Formerly also iscled; < icicle + -ed[2].] Covered with icicles: as, the icicled eaves.

Bleak Winter is from Norway come,
And such a formidable groom,
With iscled beard and hoary head.
Cotton, Winter.

The bottom curve of that icicled S on your soda fountain. Howells, Wedding Journey.

icily (ī'si-li), adv. [< icy + -ly[2].] In an icy manner; coldly; frigidly.

Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null, Dead perfection, no more. Tennyson, Maud, ii.

iciness (ī'si-nes), n. The state of being icy, or of being very cold.

With the mercury almost down to freezing-point, and an atmosphere of moist iciness, the body becomes benumbed, and the mind sluggish. Science, XII. 299.

icing (ī'sing), n. [Verbal n. of ice, v.; = Icel. ísing, sleet.] A coating of concreted sugar. Also called frosting and ice.

The splendid icing of an immense . . . plum-cake.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 492.

-icity. [F. -icité, etc., < L. -icita(t-)s: see -ic and -ity.] A compound termination of nouns (in -ity) from adjectives in -ic (the c pronounced as s before i), as catholicity, domesticity, electricity, publicity, from catholic, domestic, electric, public, etc. Comparatively few of these formations are found in Latin; examples are lubricity (LL. lubricitas), mendicity (L. mendicitas), rusticity (L. rusticitas), etc.

icker (ik'ėr), n. [< ONorth. eher, æhher, the uncontr. form of AS. eár, ear: see ear[2].] An ear of corn. [Scotch.]

A daimen [occasional] icker in a thrave
'S a sma' request. Burns, To a Mouse.

ickle[1] (ik'l), n. [E. dial., also written iccle; < ME. ikel, ikyl, iekyll, ycle, ykle, ychele, yokle, igokelle (the last two forms after the Second.), < AS. gicel, an icicle, in comp. īs-gicel, icicle, cyle-gicel, lit. 'chill-ickle,' hrīm-gicel, 'rime-ickle,' poet. hilde-gicel, 'battle-ickle,' i. e. dripping blood; = LG. -jäkel in comp. is-jäkel = Icel. jökull, an icicle, also ice, a glacier, = Norw. jökul, jukul, jukel, an icicle, = Dan. egel, in hus-egel (Aasen); dim. of a primitive lost in AS., = Icel. jaki, a piece of ice, prob. = Ir. aigh = Gael. eigh = W. ia (for iag*), ice. In comp. ice-ickle, written icicle: see icicle, where the variations of ickle under popular etymology are mentioned.] An icicle. [Prov. Eng.]

ickle[2] (ik'l), n. Same as hickwall. [Northamptonshire, Eng.]

icomet, icomen†. Middle English forms of the past participle of come.

icon (ī'kon), n.; pl. icones and icons (ī'kō-nēz, ī'konz). [< L. icon, < Gr. εἰκών, a likeness, image, portrait, similitude, semblance, phantom, < εἰκειν*, found only in perf. ind. ἔοικα, etc., be or look like, seem likely, seem fitting.] 1. An image or representation; a portrait.

Some of our own nation, and many Netherlanders, whose names and icons are published, have deserved good commendation. Hakewill, Apology.

Glory was his aim, and he [a dog] attained it; for his icon, by the hand of Caldecott, now lies among the treasures of the nation. R. L. Stevenson, Character of Dogs.

2. In the Greek or Orthodox Eastern Church, a representation of Christ, an angel, or a saint, in painting, relief, mosaic, etc. There are always two at least in a Greek church, one of Christ at the right of the holy doors, as one faces toward the bema, and one of the Theotocos on the left. In accordance with the decision of the seventh ecumenical council (the second of Nicæa, A. D. 787), icons are honored with a relative worship or adoration (προσκύνησις), manifested by kissing, offerings of incense and lights, etc., but not with latria, or the supreme worship due to God alone. They are regarded as sacred, and many are believed to be miraculous. A small icon, of the kind generally carried by the Russian peasantry, is a triptych, diptych, or similar folding tablet, of wood or metal, decorated in enamel or niello with representations of sacred subjects. Also eikon, ikon.

When robbing a church, a man will often offer several roubles' worth of candles to a neighboring icon, if it will only help him to pull out the jewels of the one he is attacking. A. J. C. Hare, Russia, i.

The "miracle-working" ikon of Our Lady of Kazan, in the Kazan Cathedral at St. Petersburg, is adorned with jewels to the value of $60,000.
G. Kennan, The Century, XXXV. 882.

3. In logic, a sign or representation which stands for its object by virtue of a resemblance or analogy to it.

Icons are so completely substituted for their objects as to be hardly distinguished from them. Such are the diagrams of geometry. A diagram, indeed, so far as it has a general signification, is not a pure icon; but in the middle part of our reasonings we forget that abstractness in great measure, and the diagram is for us the very thing. So in contemplating a painting, there is a moment when we lose the consciousness that it is not the thing, the distinction of the real and the copy vanishes, and it is for the moment a pure dream—not any particular existence, and yet not general. At that moment, we are contemplating an icon. C. S. Peirce, Amer. Jour. Math., VII. 181.

4. In scientific books, specifically, a plate, an engraving, or other printed representation.

iconantidyptic (ī-kon-an-ti-dip′tik), a. [< Gr. εἰκών, an image, + ἀντί, opposite, + δύπτειν, equiv. to δύειν, dive, duck.] Presenting two images, one direct, the other reversed, of the same object: applied to a telescope otherwise called diplantidian.

icones, n. Latin plural of icon.

iconic (ī-kon′ik), a. [< L. iconicus, < Gr. εἰκονικός, representing a figure, copied, < εἰκών, a figure, likeness: see icon.] 1. Of or pertaining to a portrait or likeness or to portraiture; of the nature of a portrait.

The library also contains a magnificent series of portraits by Holbein, eighty-seven in number, highly finished in sepia and chalk, representing the chief personages of Henry VIII.'s court—all of them works of the highest beauty, and marvels of iconic vigour.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 601.

Perhaps, in dealing with the men that make portraits, we may be allowed to use a word that is scarcely English, and call them "iconic sculptors." . . . The French have helped themselves to this convenient adjective, and we may borrow it of them.
E. W. Gosse, The Century, XXXI. 39.

2. Of, pertaining to, or resembling in any way an icon or sacred image, or the style of such image-paintings.—3. In art, conventional: applied to such work as the statues of victorious athletes commonly dedicated to divinities in antiquity, or to memorial statues and portrait-busts executed after fixed models or types, as the busts of the sovereign set up in British courts of justice.

Judging from the character of the heads, it seems probable that most of the statues are iconic, and may be the portraits of Cyprian priests and kings, dedicated, like those from the Sacred Way at Branchidæ, to the deity of the temple. C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 307.

Iconic alabastrum. See alabastrum.

iconical (ī-kon′i-kal), a. [< iconic + -al.] Same as iconic.

As the work is entirely iconical, or consists only of figures without any letterpress, catchword, alphabet, or number to the pages, it was new, and uncommon to the bookbinders. E. Mendes da Costa, Elem. of Conchology, p. 36.

iconism (ī′kon-izm), n. [< L. iconismus, < Gr. εἰκονισμός, delineation; cf. εἰκόνισμα, a copy, image, < εἰκονίζειν, image: see iconize.] A figure or representation. [Rare.]

The fancy will employ itself . . . in making some kind of apish imitations, counterfeit iconisms, symbolical adumbrations and resemblances. Cudworth.

iconize (ī′kon-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. iconized, ppr. iconizing. [< Gr. εἰκονίζειν, mold into form, give a semblance of, image, < εἰκών, an image: see icon.] To form into a likeness or resemblance. [Rare.]

This world is an image always iconized, or perpetually renewed. Cudworth.

iconoclasm (ī-kon′ō-klazm), n. [= F. iconoclasme, < Gr. εἰκών, an image, + κλασμός*, a breaking, < κλᾶν, break.] 1. The act of breaking or destroying images; specifically, a general destruction of the images and pictures set up in churches as objects of veneration carried out by the Iconoclasts in the eighth and ninth centuries, and by Protestants in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century.

The general feeling of the community, fostered diligently by a numerous class of its most energetic and pious members, the monks, continued unchanged in its aversion to iconoclasm; and, although at the end of his reign Constantine succeeded in imposing upon every citizen of Constantinople an oath never again to worship an image, there can be little doubt that in a vast number of households secret leanings to image worship had been intensified rather than weakened by repressive measures.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 713.

Hence—2. The act of attacking cherished beliefs or traditional institutions regarded as based on error or superstition; the doctrine or spirit of one who so attacks.

Iconoclasm, whether manifested in religion or in politics, has regarded the existing order of things, not as a product of evolution, but as the work of artful priests and legislators of antiquity, which may accordingly be destroyed as summarily as it was created.
J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., II. 476.

The time has been marked by a stress of scientific iconoclasm. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 7.

iconoclast (ī-kon′ō-klast), n. [= F. iconoclaste = Sp. Pg. It. iconoclasta, < MGr. NGr. εἰκονοκλάστης, < Gr. εἰκών, an image, + κλάστης*, a breaker (cf. κλάστης, a vine-dresser), < κλᾶν, break.] 1. A breaker or destroyer of images; a person conspicuously hostile to the use of images in Christian worship. Specifically—(a) [cap.] One of a sect or party in the Eastern Empire in the eighth and ninth centuries which opposed all use and veneration of icons or images, and destroyed them when in power. The party of Iconoclasts was originated by the emperor Leo the Isaurian, and afterward continued or revived by Constantine Copronymus and other emperors, especially Leo the Armenian and Theophilus. The emperors named treated those who honored icons with great cruelty, and after the death of the last of them the party of Iconoclasts soon became extinct. See iconoclastic.

Under his [Constantinus Copronymus's] auspices a council of iconoclasts was held, in which the adoration and the use of images was condemned.
Jortin, Remarks on Eccles. Hist., an. 741.

(b) One of those Protestants of the Netherlands who, during the reign of Philip II., riotously destroyed the images in many of the Roman Catholic churches.

Hence—2. Any destroyer, denouncer, or exposer of errors or impostures; one who systematically attacks cherished beliefs.

iconoclastic (ī-kon-ō-klas′tik), a. [= Pg. iconoclastico; as iconoclast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to iconoclasm, or to the opinions and practices of the Iconoclasts; given to breaking images, or to exposing errors of belief or false pretensions: as, iconoclastic enthusiasm.

Both were embellished with a profusion of statues; most of those at York were destroyed in the first emotions of iconoclastic zeal. H. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, xliv.

Yet this question, thus prematurely agitated by the iconoclastic emperors, and at this period of Christianity so fatally mistimed, is one of the most grave, and it should seem inevitable controversies, arising out of our religion.
Milman, Latin Christianity, iv. 7.

iconograph (ī-kon′ō-gràf), n. [< Gr. εἰκών, an image, + γράφειν, write: see iconography.] A figured illustration; the representation of anything by its image, as in drawing or engraving.

The illustrations have never been surpassed by the most expensive and careful iconographs. Science, IV. 28.

iconographer (ī-kō-nog′ra-fėr), n. [< iconograph-y + *-er*2.] A person versed in iconography.

The lepidopteral iconographer, when the ultimate butterfly has been described, will sigh vainly for more fields to conquer. Athenæum, Jan. 7, 1888, p. 19.

iconographic (ī-kon-ō-graf′ik), a. [< iconograph + -ic.] Relating to iconography; representing or describing by means of pictures or diagrams. A. Drummond.

iconographical (ī-kon-ō-graf′i-kal), a. [< iconographic + -al.] Same as iconographic. [Rare.]

Namatia read aloud the history of her husband, but she does not seem to have prescribed its iconographical representation. Athenæum, Oct. 13, 1888, p. 488.

iconography (ī-kō-nog′ra-fi), n. [= F. iconographie = Pg. iconographia = It. iconografia, < Gr. εἰκονογραφία, a sketch, description, < εἰκονογράφος, a portrait-painter, < εἰκών, an image, + γράφειν, write.] 1. That branch of knowledge which relates to the representation of persons or objects by means of images or statues, busts, paintings, drawings, engravings on gems or metals, and the like.—2. The art of producing likenesses, portraits, or graphic representations; the art of illustration.

As to the execution of the plates, no iconography of the present time excels them. Science, VI. 308.

3. Pictorial representation in general; an illustrative figure or collection of figures.

The inspection alone of these curious iconographies of temples and palaces affects one as much by reading, almost, as by sight. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 269.

iconolater (ī-kō-nol′a-tėr), n. [= F. iconolâtre, < Gr. εἰκών, an image, + λατρεύς, a worshiper; cf. idolater.] An image-worshiper.

iconolatry (ī-kō-nol′a-tri), n. [= Pg. iconolatria, < Gr. εἰκών, an image, + λατρεία, worship; cf. idolatry.] The worship or adoration of images; idolatry.

iconologist (ī-kō-nol′ō-jist), n. [< iconology + -ist.] One versed in iconology; one who makes a specialty of the study and identification of statues, painted or engraved likenesses, etc. I. D'Israeli.

iconology (ī-kō-nol′ō-ji), n. [= Sp. iconología = Pg. iconologia, < Gr. εἰκονολογία, figurative speaking, < εἰκών, a figure, image, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science or art of representation by effigies or pictures.—2. A description of statues, pictures, engravings, etc.

iconomachal†, a. [Erroneously iconomical (see the extract); with term. -al, = Sp. iconómaco = Pg. It. iconomaco, < Gr. εἰκονομάχος, warring against images, < εἰκών, an image, + μάχεσθαι, fight.] Eccles., opposed or hostile to pictures or images.

We should be too iconomical to question the pictures of the winds, as commonly drawn in humane heads and with their cheeks distended.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 22.

iconomachist (ī-kō-nom′a-kist), n. [< iconomach-y + -ist.] One who is opposed to and contends against the use and cultus of icons; an iconoclast.

The noted iconomachist Antony of Sylæum was raised in 821 to the patriarchate of Constantinople.
Robertson, History of the Christian Church, III. 300.

iconomachy (ī-kō-nom′a-ki), n. [< Gr. εἰκονομαχία, a war against images, < εἰκονομάχος, warring against images: see iconomachal.] Enmity or opposition to icons or sacred images; the principles and conduct of the Iconoclasts.

The monastic party [at the Nicene Council of A. D. 787] declared that iconomachy was worse than the worst of heresies, because it denied the Saviour's incarnation.
Robertson, History of the Christian Church, III. 135.

iconomatic (ī-kon-ō-mat′ik), a. [Appar. abbr. for icononomatic*, < Gr. εἰκών, an image, + ὄνομα(τ-), name.] Expressing ideas or representing words by means of pictured objects: as, iconomatic writing. Brinton.

iconomaticism (ī-kon-ō-mat′i-sizm), n. [< iconomatic + -ism.] A system of picture-writing, or the representation of words by pictured objects.

How complete a system of iconomaticism they [Egyptian and Chinese characters] passed through is unknown.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 56.

iconomical†, a. See iconomachal.

iconophilism (ī-kō-nof′i-lizm), n. [< Gr. εἰκών, an image, + φίλος, loving, + -ism.] A liking or taste for pictures or engravings. [Rare.]

He [a print-dealer] tells you that he instructs his customers in bibliomania, in bibliopegy, in grangerism, in iconophilism, in the knowledge of art.
New York Times, Feb. 12, 1888.

iconophilist (ī-kō-nof′i-list), n. [< Gr. εἰκών, an image, + φίλος, loving, + E. -ist.] A connoisseur of pictures, engravings, or prints; a collector or judge of prints. [Rare.]

The moral of that is, that in collecting prints all is not rose-colored, and one must not think of becoming an iconophilist without the study and application required for any grave pursuit. New York Times, Feb. 12, 1888.

iconostas (ī-kon′ō-stas), n. Same as iconostasis.

iconostasia, n. Plural of iconostasium.

iconostasion, iconostasium (ī-kon-ō-stā′si-on, -um), n.; pl. iconostasia (-ä). [NL., < NGr. εἰκονοστάσιον, < εἰκονόστασις: see iconostasis.] In the Gr. Ch., a movable desk or stand on which icons are placed, especially the icon of the festival or the saint of the day.

iconostasis (ī-kō-nos′tā-sis), n. [< NGr. εἰκονόστασις, < Gr. εἰκών, an image, + στάσις, a standing, position, < ἱστασθαι, stand.] In Greek churches, a high solid screen, usually of wood, reaching at least half-way and often nearly or quite to the ceiling of the church, and separating the bema, chapel of prothesis, and diaconicon from the rest of the church. It has three doors, the holy doors in the center, leading directly into the bema proper or sanctuary (ἱερατεῖον), a door on the right of this, as one faces the bema, admitting to the diaconicon or sacristy, and one on the left opening into the chapel of prothesis. It is from this last door that the processions known as the Little and the Great Entrance (see entrance) emerge. The doors, especially the central or holy doors, are provided with a veil (amphithyra). As the choir of an Oriental church does not intervene between the sanctuary and the nave, the iconostasis answers in some respects both to the Western altar-rails and to a rood-screen. Ritually it corresponds to altar-rails, as it divides the sanctuary from all the rest of the church, the choir included.

icosacolic (ī″kō-sa-kō′lik), a. [< Gr. εἰκοσάκωλος, of twenty clauses, < εἴκοσι, twenty, + κῶλον, member, clause: see *colon*1.] In anc. pros., consisting of twenty cola (members or series): as, an icosacolic canticum. Also spelled eicosacolic.

icosahedral (ī″kō-sa-hē′dral), a. [Also icosihedral; < icosahedr-on + -al.] Having twenty faces. —Icosahedral function. See polyhedral function, under polyhedral.—Icosahedral group. See *group*1.—Ico- sahedral number, one of the numbers 1, 12, 48, 142, 255, 456, etc., whose form is $\frac{1}{2}n(5n^2 - 5n + 2)$.

icosahedron (ī″kō-sa-hē′drǫn), n. [Also written icosaedron, icosihedron; < Gr. εἰκοσάεδρον, a body with twenty sides, neut. of εἰκοσάεδρος, εἰκοσίεδρος, of twenty sides, < εἴκοσι, twenty (see icosian), + ἕδρα, a seat, base, = E. settle[1], a seat.] A solid bounded by twenty planes. In the ordinary regular icosahedron the faces are equal equilateral triangles, equally inclined each to those adjacent to it. It has 12 summits and 30 edges, 3 edges per face, 5 edges per summit.—Great icosahedron, a regular solid of which each face subtends at the center the space subtended by 4 faces and 6 half-faces of the ordinary icosahedron. It has 20 faces, 12 summits, 30 edges, 3 edges per face, 5 edges per summit. Each summit is enwrapped twice by the series of faces about it, and the center is inclosed seven times.—Truncated icosahedron, a dyocætriacontahedron formed by cutting down the corners of the icosahedron parallel to the faces of the coaxial regular dodecahedron until the original faces are regular hexagons, so that the solid has 20 hexagonal and 12 pentagonal faces.

Regular Icosahedron.

Great Icosahedron.

icosander (ī-kō-san′dėr), n. [< NL. icosandrus: see icosandrous.] In bot., a plant having twenty or more stamens inserted on the calyx.

Icosandria (ī-kō-san′dri-ą), n. pl. [NL., < icosandrus, with twenty stamens: see icosandrous.] In bot., the twelfth class in the Linnean system of classification, distinguished by having twenty or more stamens inserted on the calyx, as in the rose family. The plants in this class produce the most esteemed fruits.

icosandrian (ī-kō-san′dri-an), a. [< Icosandria, + -ian.] Same as icosandrous.

icosandrous (ī-kō-san′drus), a. [< NL. icosandrus, with twenty stamens, < Gr. εἴκοσι, twenty, + ἀνήρ (ανδρ-), a male (in mod. bot. a stamen): see -androus.] Of or pertaining to the Icosandria.

icosasemic (ī″kō-sa-sē′mik), a. [< Gr. εἴκοσι, twenty, + σῆμα, a mark, σημεῖον, a mark, mora.] In anc. pros., containing or amounting to twenty semeia or units of time; having or constituting a magnitude of twenty moræ or normal shorts: thus, a dactylic or anapestic pentapody is icosasemic. Also spelled eicosasemic.

icosian (ī-kō′si-an), a. [< Gr. εἴκοσι, dial. εἴκατι, βείκατι, ϝείκατι, twenty, = L. viginti = E. twenty: see twenty.] Pertaining to twenty.—Icosian game, a game in which there are twenty stations each united with three others by paths, as the 20 vertices of an ordinary dodecahedron are connected by the 30 edges. Five stations being named as consecutive, a player endeavors to pass through all the other stations without passing through any one twice.

icosidodecahedron (ī″kō-si-dō″dek-a-hē′drǫn), n. [NL., < Gr. εἴκοσι, twenty, + δώδεκα, twelve, + ἕδρα, seat, base.] In geom., a solid of thirty-two faces formed by cutting down the corners of the icosahedron parallel to the faces of the coaxial regular dodecahedron until the new faces just touch at the angles, thus leaving 20 triangular and 12 pentagonal faces. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.—Truncated icosidodecahedron, a solid having 12 decagonal faces belonging to the regular dodecahedron, 20 hexagonal faces belonging to the icosahedron, and 30 square faces belonging to the semi-regular triacontahedron. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

icosihedral, icosihedron. See icosahedral, icosahedron.

icositetrahedron (ī″kō-si-tet-ra-hē′drǫn), n. [NL., < Gr. εἴκοσι, = E. twenty, + τέτρα-, τέτταρες, = E. four, + ἕδρα, seat, base.] In crystal., a solid, belonging to the isometric system, which is contained by twenty-four similar four-sided planes; a tetragonal trisoctahedron, or trapezohedron.

icosteid (ī-kos′tē-id), n. A fish of the family Icosteidæ.

Icosteidæ (ī-kos-tē′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Icosteus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Icosteus, fishes with a loose flaccid skin, unarmed head, long dorsal and anal fins with scarcely differentiated spines, and thoracic ventral fins. It was constituted for two deep-sea fishes obtained off the Californian coast. It is scarcely distinguishable from Stromateidæ.

icosteine (ī-kos′tē-in), n. A fish of the family Icosteidæ.

Icosteus (ī-kos′tē-us), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. εἴκειν, yield, give way, + ὀστέον, a bone.] The typical genus of the family Icosteidæ, having a naked body with some spinules along the lateral line, and quadriradiate ventrals. I. enigmaticus is a deep-sea fish of California.

Icosteus enigmaticus.

icret, n. A misprint for dicker (ten as a unit of exchange).

> As we find in the Survey booke of England, the king demanded in manner no other tribute than certain Icres of Iron, and Iron barres. Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 361.
>
> An icre is ten Bars. Gibson, tr. of Camden (margin).

-ics. [< -ic + pl. -s[2], after L. and Gr. plurals in -ic-a, -ικ-ά, neut. pl. of adjectives in -ic-us, -ικ-ός, in names of sciences or arts, as in μαθηματικά, mathematical (matters), interchanging with forms in the fem. sing. L. -ic-a, or -ic-e, Gr. -ικ-ή (ἐπιστήμη, knowledge, science, or τέχνη, art, being understood), as μαθηματική, L. mathematica, mathematice, mathematical (science). In F., G., etc., these words follow the fem. sing. form; in E. either or both forms are used: see examples.] A termination of Greek origin, denoting a science or an art. Words with this termination are properly plural, but are now commonly regarded as singular, being often accompanied by forms actually in the singular, as mathematics, hydrostatics, esthetics or esthetic, metrics or metric, etc. In some cases the singular alone is in use, as in logic, music, the adjective being then exclusively in -ic-al, as logical, musical, while in a few a distinction of meaning has grown up, as between physic and physics. Any adjective in -ic, applicable to a branch of knowledge, may have an accompanying noun in -ics.

Icteria (ik-tē′ri-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἴκτερος, a certain bird: see Icterus.] A notable genus of American oscine passerine birds; the yellow-breasted chats or chattering flycatchers. It was founded by Vieillot in 1807, and has been variously referred to the Turdidæ or thrushes, Vireonidæ or greenlets, or made the type of the Icteriinæ as a subfamily of Sylvicolidæ or Dendrœcidæ. It is characterized by a stout compressed bill with high arched culmen, greenish coloration above, with bright-yellow breast and white abdomen, and a size unusual in the last-named family. The type is I. virens or I. viridis, which abounds in the United States, is migratory and insectivorous, a voluble and versatile songster with remarkable powers of mimicry, and which nests in shrubbery, laying usually four white eggs with reddish speckles. I. longicauda is another species or variety, inhabiting the southwestern portions of the United ★States. See cut under chat[2].

icteric (ik-ter′ik), a. and n. [= F. ictérique = Sp. ictérico = Pg. icterico = It. itterico, < L. ictericus, < Gr. ἱκτερικός, jaundiced, < ἴκτερος, jaundice: see icterus.] I. a. 1. Affected with jaundice.—2. Preventing or dispelling jaundice.—Icteric fever, icteric remittent fever, remitting icteric fever. See fever[1].

II. n. A remedy for jaundice.

icterical (ik-ter′i-kal), a. [< icteric + -al.] Same as icteric.

> Our understandings, if a crime be lodged in the will, being like icterical eyes, transmitting the species to the soul with prejudice, disaffection, and colours of their own framing. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 167.

icterid (ik′te-rid), n. One of the Icteridæ.

Icteridæ (ik-ter′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Icterus + -idæ.] A large family of American oscine passerine birds with 9 primaries, a conic-acute bill with unnotched tip, rictus without bristles, and angulated commissure. The family is very closely related to the Fringillidæ; it has also affinities with the Corvidæ, and represents in America the Sturnidæ or starlings of the old world. There are upward of 100 species, assigned to many genera, containing the birds variously known as American starlings, blackbirds, orioles or hangnests, meadow-larks, cow-birds, bobolinks, etc. The family is divided by Coues into four subfamilies, Agelæinæ or marsh-blackbirds, Sturnellinæ or meadow-larks, Icterinæ or orioles and hangnests, and Quiscalinæ or crow-blackbirds. A subfamily Icterinæ includes all the American orioles or hangnests and related forms.

icterine (ik′te-rin), a. [< NL. icterinus, < Gr. ἴκτερος, jaundice: see icterus.] Yellow, or marked with yellow, as a bird; specifically, having the characters of the Icteridæ or Icterinæ.

icteritious (ik-te-rish′us), a. [< L. icterus, Gr. ἴκτερος, the jaundice, + E. -it-ious.] Yellow; having the color of jaundiced skin.

icteritous (ik-ter′i-tus), a. Same as icteritious.

icteroid (ik′te-roid), a. [< Gr. ἰκτεροειδής, contr. ἰκτερώδης, jaundiced, < ἴκτερος, jaundice, + εἶδος, form.] Yellow, as if jaundiced.

icterus (ik′te-rus), n. [NL., < L. icterus, Gr. ἴκτερος, jaundice; also a bird of a yellowish-green color, by looking at which, according to the simple therapeutics of the ancients, a jaundiced person was cured—the bird died; cf. ἰκτερίας (sc. λίθος), L. icterias, a yellowish kind of stone.] 1. The jaundice.—2. In bot., a yellow appearance assumed by wheat and some other plants under the influence of prolonged exposure to moisture and cold.—3. [cap.] In ornith., a Brissonian (1760) genus of birds, approximately equivalent to the modern family Icteridæ; subsequently used with various limitations, or as conterminous with the subfamily Icterinæ; now restricted to the American orioles or hangnests, such as the Baltimore oriole, Icterus galbula. The type is technically considered to be the troopial, Oriolus icterus (Linnæus), now called Icterus vulgaris. See cut under troopial.—4. [cap.] A genus of mam-★mals. Griffith, 1827.

ictic (ik′tik), a. [< L. as if icticus,* < ictus, a blow: see ictus.] Sudden or abrupt, as if produced by a blow; marked. Bushnell. [Rare.]

Icticyon (ik-tis′i-on), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰκτις, the yellow-breasted marten (taken in general sense of a 'weasel'), + κύων, a dog, = E. hound.] A genus of Canidæ with small molars, 1 above and 2 below on each side, containing I. venaticus, the bush-dog of South America, a small, close-haired species with short limbs and tail. The genus is a peculiar one; it is sometimes referred wrongly to the family Mustelidæ, but belongs to the true dogs, Caninæ, and is related to the African Lycaon and the Indian Cyon. Lund, 1842. Also written Ictidocyon.

ictide (ik′tid), n. An animal of the genus Ictides (or Arctictis); a binturong: as, the black ictide, Ictides ater.

Ictides (ik-tī′dēz), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. ἰκτις, the yellow-breasted marten, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of Viverridæ, of the subfamily Arctictinæ, containing the binturongs: a synonym of Arctictis.

Ictinia (ik-tin′i-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰκτῖνος, a kite.] A notable genus of kites, of the subfamily Milvinæ and family Falconidæ, founded by Vieillot in 1816. The tail is short and even; the wings are moderate, with the third and second primaries longest, and the first very short; the feet are small; the tarsi are scutellate in front; the bill is small but robust, with very convex culmen and small subcircular nostrils; and the plumage is dark-plumbeous or bluish. There are two species, both American, one of which is the common Mississippi kite, I. subcœrulea or mississipiensis, and the other the South American, I. plumbea.

Ictiobinæ (ik″ti-ō-bī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ictiobus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Catostomidæ, with an elongate dorsal fin, compressed oblong body, and an interparietal fontanelle. It embraces a few large fishes, inhabiting chiefly the Mississippi and Great Lake basins, known as buffalo-fishes or buffaloes, and carp-suckers. See cut under carp-sucker.

Ictiobus (ik-tī′ō-bus), n. [NL., a perversion of Ichthyobus, < Gr. ἰχθύς, a fish, + βοῦς, an ox (taken for 'buffalo': see buffalo).] A genus of fishes of the family Catostomidæ, popularly known as buffalo-fishes, typical of the subfamily Ictiobinæ. Rafinesque, 1820. See cut under carp-sucker.

Ictitherium (ik-ti-thē′ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἰκτις, the yellow-breasted marten, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals from the Pliocene of Greece and elsewhere, of uncertain systematic position: in some respects related to the Viverridæ, whence the name, given by Gaudry; in others ★allied to the Hyænidæ.

ictus (ik′tus), n.; pl. ictus. [L. ictus, a blow, stroke, stab, thrust; in prosody or music, a beating time, a beat; < icere, pp. ictus, strike, hit, smite.] 1. A stroke: as, ictus solis, sunstroke.—2. In pros. and music, rhythmical or metrical stress; additional intensity of utterance or delivery distinguishing one time or syllable in a foot or series from the others. Metrical ictus in poetry is analogous to syllabic stress or accent in ordinary speech. In modern or accentual poetry an ictus regularly coincides with the syllabic stress or accent, primary or secondary. In classical or quantitative poetry the ictus was also a stress-accent, but was independent of the syllabic accent, which was a difference in tone or pitch. It regularly attached itself to a long time or syllable as contrasted with one or more shorts, but a long or longs could be metrically unaccented. The conflict between ictus and accent in ancient poetry may be exemplified by the line

> Connúbio júngam stábili própriámque dicábo > (Virgil, Æneid, i. 73), in which the accent is marked and the syllables bearing the ictus are italicized. The part of a foot on which the ictus falls is called the thesis (but see arsis). In a dipody one ictus is stronger than the other. In a colon the ictus of one measure dominates all others. A subordinate ictus can also accompany the principal ictus within the same foot.

icy (ī'si), a. [< ME. isy*, < AS. īsig (= D. ijzig, G. eisig = Sw. isig); < is, ice, + -ig, E. -y[1].] 1. Pertaining to, composed of, produced by, resembling, or abounding with ice: as, an icy surface; icy coldness; the icy regions of the north.

> There is no armour against fate;
> Death lays his icy hands on kings.
> Shirley, Contention of Ajax and Ulysses, iii.

> Tempt icy seas, where scarce the waters roll,
> Where clearer flames glow round the frozen pole.
> Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 389.

> Solar beams powerful enough to fuse the snows and blister the human skin . . . may pass through the air, and still leave it at an icy temperature.
> Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 102.

2. Figuratively, characterized by coldness or coolness, as of manner, influence, etc.; frigid; chilling; freezing; indifferent.

> If he be leaden, icy, cold, unwilling,
> Be thou so too. Shak., Rich. III., iii. 1.

> Icy was the deportment with which Philip received these demonstrations of affection.
> Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 136.

=Syn. 2. Frosty, cold-hearted, stony.

icy-pearled (ī'si-pėrld), a. Studded with spangles of ice. [Rare.]

> So mounting up in icy-pearled car,
> Through middle empire of the freezing air
> He wander'd long, till thee he spied from far.
> Milton, Ode, D. F. I., iii.

id. An abbreviation of idem.

-id[1]. [Formerly also -ide (< F.); = F. -ide = ★Sp. Pg. It. -ido, < L. -idus, a term. forming adjectives from verbs in -ēre, -ere, or from nouns, as in acidus, acid, < acēre, be sour, aridus, arid, < arēre, be dry, fluidus, fluid, < fluere, flow, vividus, living, < vivere, live, morbidus, morbid, < morbus, disease, turbidus, turbid, < turba, disturbance, etc. The suffix is really -dus (-do-), the -i- repr. the orig. or supplied stem-vowel; it occurs without the vowel in absurdus, absurd, blandus, bland, crudus, raw (crude), etc. Cf. Gr. -ιδ-ης, -ι(δ)ς, etc.: see -id[2].] 1. A common termination in adjectives (and nouns derived from adjectives) of Latin origin, as in acid, arid, fluid, vivid, turbid, morbid, flaccid, frigid, torrid, solid, etc. It is not used as a formative in English.—2. [NL. -idum, neut. of L. -idus.] In chem., a formative (also spelled -ide, and when so spelled generally pronounced -īd) suffixed to names of elements to form names of compounds, as in oxid, chlorid, bromide, iodide, sulphid, etc., designating compounds of oxygen, chlorin, bromine, iodine, sulphur, etc. Usage is, in general, in favor of the form -ide; but in new formations, ★and in many of the old ones, the form -id is also in use.

-id[2]. [(1) L. NL. -is (-id-), pl. -id-es, fem.; (2) L. NL. -id-es, pl. -id-æ; both of Greek origin: see -ides, -idæ, and -is[2]; cf. -ad[2].] 1. The termination of nouns Englished from Latin or New Latin feminine nouns (ultimately Greek or on the Greek model) in -is, as caryatid, hydatid, etc. —2. In zoöl., the termination of nouns Englished from Latin or New Latin nouns in -idæ, as felid, from Felidæ, fringillid, from Fringillidæ, etc. In this dictionary such English forms, being always adjacent to their obvious primitives, are usually left without etymological note.

-ida. [NL., assumed as a neut. pl. to -ides, pl. -idæ.] In zoöl., a frequent termination of the names of groups of animals, of no determinate rank in the classificatory scale. Entomologists often use it for subfamilies, in which case it is the same as -inæ. It may or may not be etymologically the same as -oida.

-idæ. [L. NL., pl. of -ides, < Gr. -ιδης, pl. -ιδαι, patronymic suffix: see -ides.] 1. In words of Greek origin, a suffix denoting the descendants of a person to whose name the suffix is attached, or a family or kindred of a particular origin: as, the Heraclidæ, Homeridæ, Eupatridæ, etc. Specifically—2. In zoöl., the regular termination of the names of families, suffixed to the stem of the name of the genus whence that of the family is derived, as Felidæ (from Felis), Laniidæ (from Lanius), Apodidæ (from Apus), etc. When the stem ends in -i-, the termination is properly, according to Greek analogies, -adæ, as Laniadæ, Simiadæ, etc.; but, for mechanical uniformity, zoölo-★gists prefer to use -idæ in all cases. See -id[2].

Idæan (ī-dē'an), a. [< L. Idæus, < Gr. Ἰδαῖος, < Ἰδη, L. Ida (see def.).] Pertaining to Mount Ida, (a) a mountain near the ancient Troy, or (b) the chief mountain in Crete, the mystic birthplace of Zeus: as, the Idæan Zeus.

> Here eke that famous golden Apple grew . . .
> For which th' Idæan Ladies disagreed.
> Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 54.

Idalian (ī-dā'liąn), a. [< L. Idalius, adj., < Idalium, also Idalia, Gr. Ἰδάλιον, a city in Cyprus.] Of or pertaining to the ancient town of Idalia or Idalium in Cyprus, or to Aphrodite (Venus), to whom it was consecrated; inhabiting Idalia.

> Idalian Aphrodite beautiful,
> Fresh as the foam, new-bathed in Paphian wells.
> Tennyson, Œnone.

ide[1] (īd), n. [< Norw. id, also called idmurt (murt, mort, small-fry, also a roach), = Sw. id, ide; in NL. idus.] A cyprinoid fish, Idus idus. The golden ide is a cultivated variety, known as the orfe. It resembles the chub, and is found in northern European waters.

ide[2]†, n. [ME.: see ides.] See ides.

> The first [season in the year] . . . is Vere, and yt begynneth the vij. ide of Feuerell and endurith to the vij. ide of May. Arnold's Chron., p. 176.

-ide[1]. [See -id[1].] 1. An obsolete form of -id[1] in adjectives like acide, fluide, etc. See -id[1], 1. —2. In chem., same as -id[1], 2.

-ide[2]. [See -id[2].] 1. Same as -id[2], 1.—2. In ★zoöl., same as -id[2], 2.

idea (ī-dē'ą), n. [Also dial. idee; = F. idée = Sp. It. idea = Pg. idea, ideia = D. G. Dan. idee = Sw. idé, < L. idea (iděa, in ML. appar. idēa) (first in Seneca; Cicero writes it as Greek), a (Platonic) idea, archetype, < Gr. ἰδέα, form, the look or semblance of a thing as opposed to reality, a kind, sort; in the Platonic philosophy the ἰδέαι were general or ideal forms, pattern forms, archetype models, L. formæ, of which, respectively, all created things were the imperfect antitypes or representations; < ἰδεῖν, see, = L. videre, see, = Skt. √ vid, know, perceive, = AS. witan, E. wit, know: see wit.] 1. In the Platonic philosophy, and in similar idealistic thought, an archetype, or pure immaterial pattern, of which the individual objects in any one natural class are but the imperfect copies, and by participation in which they have their being: in this sense the word is generally qualified by the adjective Platonic.

> The more probable view, Parmenides, of these ideas is that they are patterns fixed in nature, and that other things are like them; and that what is meant by the participation of other things in the ideas is really assimilation to them.
> Plato, Parmenides (tr. by Jowett), III. 249.

> Socrates, he [Parmenides] said, I admire the bent of your mind towards philosophy; tell me, now, was this your own distinction between abstract ideas and the things which partake of them? and do you think that there is an idea of likeness apart from the likeness which we possess, or of the one and many, or of the other notions of which Zeno has been speaking?
> I think that there are such abstract ideas, said Socrates.
> Parmenides proceeded. And would you also make abstract ideas of the just and the beautiful and the good, and of all that class of notions?
> Yes, he said, I should.
> And would you make an abstract idea of man distinct from us and from all other human creatures, or of fire and water?
> I am often undecided, Parmenides, as to whether I ought to include them or not.
> Plato, Parmenides (tr. by Jowett), III. 246.

2. A mental image or picture. [Although Sir W. Hamilton says that idea never was used in any language in any but the Platonic sense (def. 1) until the time of Descartes, in English, as in French, this second meaning has been since the middle of the sixteenth century the commoner one in literature.]

> Within my hart, though hardly it can shew > Thing so divine to vew of earthly eye,
> The fayre Idea of your celestiall hew
> And every parte remaines immortally.
> Spenser, Sonnets, xlv.

> When he shall hear she died upon his words,
> The idea of her life shall sweetly creep
> Into his study of imagination.
> Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1.

> [Species] is called idea [of the Greeks], which is as much to say as a common shape conceiued in the mind, through some knowledge had before of one or two individuums having that shape: so as after we have seen one wolfe, or two, we beare the shape thereof continually in our minds, and thereby are able to know a wolfe whensoever we find him. Blundeville, Arte of Logicke (1599), iv.

> Yet still how faint by precept is expresst
> The living image in the painter's breast;
> Thence endless streams of fair ideas flow,
> Strike in the sketch or in the picture glow.
> Pope, To Mr. Jervas.

3. In the language of Descartes and of English philosophers, an immediate object of consciousness — that is, what one feels when one feels, or fancies when one fancies, or thinks when one thinks. With the nominalists Berkeley and Hume, the meaning of the word hardly departs from def. 2; with Reid, Dugald Stewart, and others, it denotes an object different from the real thing and from the mind, but mediating between them. Hume, however, uses the word idea in a somewhat peculiar sense, to mean a sensation reproduced and worked over. In modern psychology, an idea is a complex of sensations, presented or represented (= G. vorstellung).

> Whatsoever the mind perceives in itself, or is the immediate object of perception, thought, or understanding, that I call idea. Locke, Human Understanding, II. viii. § 9.

> Since therefore the objects of sense exist only in the mind, and are withal thoughtless and inactive, I choose to mark them by the word idea, which implies those properties. Bp. Berkeley, Human Knowledge, I. 29.

> All the perceptions of the human mind resolve themselves into two distinct kinds, which I call Impressions and Ideas. The difference betwixt these consists in the degrees of force and liveliness with which they strike upon the mind and make their way into our thoughts or consciousness. Those perceptions which enter with the most force and violence we name impressions; and under this name I comprehend all our sensations, passions, and emotions, as they make their first appearance in the soul. By ideas, I mean the faint images of these in thinking and reasoning. Hume, Treatise of Human Nature, I. i. § 1.

> The term idea is commonly used to include both images and concepts, marking off the whole region of the representative from the presentative. But like the term notion, it tends now to be confined to concepts.
> J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., vii.

4. A conception of what is desirable or ought to be, different from what has been observed; a governing conception or principle; a teleological conception.

> For anie understanding knoweth the skil of the artificer standeth in that idea or foreconceit of the work, and not in the work itselfe. Sir P. Sidney, Def. of Poesie.

> I thought you once as fair
> As women in th' idea are.
> Cowley, The Mistress.

> There is what I call the American idea. . . . This idea demands, as the proximate organization thereof, a democracy — that is, a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people; of course, a government on the principles of eternal justice, the unchanging law of God; for shortness' sake, I will call it the idea of Freedom.
> Theodore Parker, Speech at Antislavery Convention, [Boston, May 29, 1850.

5. In the Kantian philos., a conception of reason the object of which transcends all possible experience, as God, Freedom of the Will, Immortality; in the Hegelian philos., the absolute truth of which everything that exists is the expression — the ideal realized, the essence which includes its own existence: in the latter sense commonly used with the definite article; in other a priori philosophies, an a priori conception of a perfection to be aimed at, not corresponding to anything observed, nor ever fully realized.

> Idea is the thorough adequacy of thought to itself, the solution of the contradictions which attach to thought, and hence, in the last resort, the coincidence or equilibrium of subjective notion and objectivity, which are the finite expression of that fundamental antithesis of thought.
> Wallace, Logic of Hegel, Prolegomena, xxiii.

6. An opinion; a thought, especially one not well established by evidence.

> That fellow seems to me to possess but one idea, and that a wrong one. Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1770.

> Unluckily Lord Palmerston became possessed with the idea that the French minister in Greece was secretly setting the Greek Government on to resist our claims.
> J. McCarthy, Hist. Own Times, xix.

7. An abstract principle, of not much immediate practical consequence in existing circumstances.

> France went to war for the idea when she had nothing else to go to war for; and, having bound liberty hand and foot at home, proclaimed herself again the apostle of liberty. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 238.

8. [cap.] In entom., a genus of nymphalid butterflies, based on the Indian Nymphalis idea: now called Hestia. Fabricius, 1808.—9. In music, a theme or subject; a phrase; sometimes, a figure. Often called a musical idea.—Absolute idea, the idea considered as the source of all reality.—Architectonic idea, the preliminary plan or sketch of a science.—Association of ideas. See association.—Decomplex, duplex idea, a union of two or more complex ideas in one.—Determinate idea. See determinate.—Innate idea. See innate.—Material idea, or idea in the brain, an impression made upon the brain by an external object.—Platonic idea. See def. 1.

ideaed, idea'd (ī-dē'ąd), a. [< idea + -ed[2].] Provided with or possessed of an idea or ideas: used chiefly in compounds: as, a one-ideaed man.

> The writer had omitted to put the idea'd words into red ink; so they had to be picked out with infinite difficulty from the mass of un*idea'd* ones.
> C. Reade, Love me Little, vi.

ideagenous (ī-dē-aj'e-nus), a. [< idea + -genous.] Generating or giving rise to ideas.

> Each sensory impression leaves behind a record in the structure of the brain — an ideagenous molecule, so to speak; . . . it is these ideagenous molecules which are the ★physical basis of memory. Huxley, Animal Automatism.

ideal (ī-dē'al), a. and n. [< F. ideal, now idéal = Sp. Pg. ideal = It. ideale = D. ideaal = G. Dan. Sw. ideal, < LL. idealis, existing in idea, < L. idea, idea: see idea.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to or consisting in ideas.

The plays of children are endless imitation, and the constant exercise of the ideal faculty.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 176.

Even now few Americans set a proper value on the relative bearing of our ideal and intellectual progress thus far. Stedman, Poets of America, Int., p. ix.

It will be understood that by an ideal object is meant an object present in idea but not yet given in reality.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 229, note.

2. Existing only in idea; confined to thought or imagination. Hence—(a) Not real or practical; imaginary; visionary; incapable of being realized or carried out in fact: as, ideal wealth or happiness; an ideal scheme of benevolence.

He [Spenser] lifts everything, not beyond recognition, but to an ideal distance where no mortal, I had almost said human, fleck is visible.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 186.

(b) Conforming completely to a standard of perfection; perfect.

There will always be a wide interval between practical and ideal excellence. Rambler.

Planning ideal commonwealths. Southey.

All virtue, all duty, all activeness of the human character, are set out by him [Spenser], under the forms of chivalry, for our instruction: but his ideal knight is Christian to the core. Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 211.

3. In philos., regarding ideas as the only real entities; pertaining to or of the nature of idealism.

The advantage of the ideal theory over the popular faith is this, that it presents the world in precisely that view which is most desirable to the mind. Emerson, Nature.

4. Arising from ideas or conceptions; based upon an ideal or ideals; manifesting or embodying imagination; imaginative: as, the ideal school in art or literature; an ideal statue or portrait.—Ideal beauty. See beauty.—Ideal bitangent, a real line which touches a curve at two imaginary points.—Ideal chord, in geom., that part of a line not really cutting a conic which lies between two points, H and H′, conjugate with respect to the conic and bisected by the diameter through the pole of the line.—Ideal diameter. See diameter.—Ideal number, in the theory of complex numbers, a number not in the scheme of complex numbers considered in any investigation, but specially introduced as a factor of a number which is prime so far as the system of complex numbers considered is concerned.—Ideal partition, in logic, a division of a whole into parts which can be sundered only in abstraction, not in reality; metaphysical partition. Sir W. Hamilton.—Syn. 2. Imaginary, fanciful, shadowy, unreal, chimerical.

II. n. 1. That which exists only in idea; a conception that exceeds reality.

A rigid solid . . . is an ideal; no substance is absolutely rigid. A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 199.

2. An imaginary object or individual in which an idea is conceived to be completely realized; hence, a standard or model of perfection: as, the ideal of beauty, virtue, etc.; Bayard, the ideal of chivalry.

While the idea gives rules, the ideal serves as the archetype for the permanent determination of the copy; and we have no other rule of our actions but the conduct of that divine man within us, with which we compare ourselves, and by which we judge and better ourselves, though we can never reach it. These ideals, though they cannot claim objective reality, are not therefore to be considered as chimeras, but supply reason with an indispensable standard, because it requires the concept of that which is perfect of its kind, in order to estimate and measure by it the degree and number of the defects in the imperfect.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller, II. 491.

Æsthetic effects call up not merely ideas, but ideals. A great work of art improves upon the real in two respects: it intensifies and it transfigures.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 70.

3. A standard of desire; an ultimate object or aim; a mental conception of what is most desirable: as, one's ideal of enjoyment; our ideals are seldom attained.—Beau ideal. See beau-ideal.—Syn. 2. Pattern, Model, etc. See example.

idealess (ī-dē′a-les), a. [< idea + -less.] Destitute of ideas.

idealisation, idealise, etc. See idealization, idealize, etc.

idealism (ī-dē′a-lizm), n. [= F. idéalisme = Sp. Pg. It. idealismo = D. G. idealismus = Dan. idealisme = Sw. idealism, < LL. idealis, ideal: see ideal and -ism.] 1. The metaphysical doctrine that the real is of the nature of thought; the doctrine that all reality is in its nature psychical.

It is our cognizance of the successiveness or transitoriness of feelings that makes us object intuitively to any idealism which is understood to imply an identification of the realities of the world with the feelings of men.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 37.

It is the very essence of the Kantian idealism that objects are not there till they are thought.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 327.

2. Pursuit of the ideal; the act or practice of idealizing; especially, imaginative treatment of subjects; a striving after ideal beauty, truth, justice, etc.—3. In art, the effort to realize the highest type of any natural object by eliminating all its imperfect elements and combining the perfect into a whole which represents Nature, not as she is exhibited in any one example, but as she might be.—Absolute idealism, the doctrine of G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), that things derive their reality from their being made by thought, which has an objective existence as a part of the divine absolute idea (this being the organic unity of all thought), and that things are not merely phenomena to us, but are of their inner nature phenomena or thoughts. The term is by English writers sometimes applied to any dogmatic idealism, such as that of Berkeley.—Berkeleian idealism, the doctrine of Bishop Berkeley (1685–1753), that the souls of men and of God, and the ideas in them, are the only existences, and that the reality of external things consists only in their permanence and coherency. Also called theistic, phenomenal, and empirical idealism.—Cosmothetic idealism, the doctrine that the external world exists, but that we have no immediate knowledge of it.—Egotistical idealism, the doctrine that ideas are modes of the human mind itself, and are destitute of external prototypes.—Fichtean or subjective idealism, the doctrine of J. G. Fichte (1762–1814), that the universal subject or ego (not the ego of an individual person) is the source of the object, the external world, or non-ego.—Objective idealism, the doctrine of F. W. J. von Schelling (1775–1854), that the relation between the subject and the object of thought is one of absolute identity. It supposes that all things exist in the absolute reason, that matter is extinct mind, and that the laws of physics are the same as those of mental representations.—Transcendental idealism, the doctrine of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), that the things to which the conceptions of reality, actuality, etc., are applicable are merely phenomena or appearances, and not things-in-themselves, or things as they are apart from their relation to the thinker. Things-in-themselves are held to be absolutely unknowable.

idealist (ī-dē′a-list), n. [= F. idéaliste = Sp. Pg. It. idealista = D. Dan. Sw. idealist, < LL. idealis, ideal: see ideal and -ist.] 1. One who holds some form of the philosophical doctrine of idealism: opposed to realist.

All are idealists, to whom the world of sense and time is a delusion and snare, and who regard the Idea as the only substance. J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, v. § 3.

2. One who pursues or dwells upon the ideal; a seeker after the highest beauty or good.—3. An imaginative, unpractical person; a day-dreamer.—Cosmothetic idealist, one who holds that we have no immediate intuition of a real non-ego or external world, but who nevertheless maintains that its existence is known inferentially by its effects in sensation. The term was introduced by Sir W. Hamilton (Reid's Works, note C).

idealistic (ī-dē-a-lis′tik), a. [< idealist + -ic.] 1. Relating or pertaining to the philosophical doctrine of idealism or to idealists.—2. Belonging to an ideal or ideals; striving for or imagining ideal perfection or good: as, idealistic poetry or art; idealistic dreams.

ideality (ī-dē-al′i-ti), n. [= F. idéalité = Sp. idealidad = It. idealità = G. idealität = Dan. Sw. idealitet, < ML. idealita(t-)s*, ideality, < LL. idealis, ideal: see ideal and -ity.] 1. The condition or quality of being ideal: opposed to reality; in the Hegelian philos., existence only as an element, factor, or moment.

The reality of a body is its separateness as an isolated object; its ideality begins when its reality is abolished and it has become a moment or dynamic element in a larger unity. Wallace.

2. The faculty or capacity of forming ideals.

Thus we might expect to find, wherever the fancy, the imagination, and the ideality are strong, some traces of a sentiment innate in the human organization.
R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 325.

3. That which is ideal or unreal.

Sensuous certitude and the abstract classifications of science have put to flight the winged and mist-clad ideal-ities of philosophy. Jour. Spec. Phil., XIX. 34.

Transcendental ideality, existence regarded as dependent upon the conditions of possible experience.

We maintain the empirical reality of space, so far as every possible experience is concerned, but at the same time its transcendental ideality: that is to say, we maintain that space is nothing, if we leave out of consideration the condition of a possible experience, and accept it as something on which things by themselves are in any way dependent.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller, II. 25.

idealization (ī-dē″a-li-zā′shon), n. [= F. idéalisation = Sp. idealización; as idealize + -ation.] The act of forming in idea or in thought; the act of making ideal. Also spelled idealisation.

idealize (ī-dē′a-līz), v.; pret. and pp. idealized, ppr. idealizing. [= F. idéaliser = Sp. idealizar = Pg. idealisar = D. idealiseren = G. idealisiren = Dan. idealisere = Sw. idealisera; as ideal + -ize.] I. trans. To make ideal; give form to in accordance with any preconceived ideal; embody in an ideal form: as, to idealize a portrait.

The kinship of pity to love is shown among other ways in this, that it idealizes its object.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 18.

II. intrans. To form ideals.
Also spelled idealise.

idealizer (ī-dē′a-lī-zėr), n. One who idealizes; an idealist. Also spelled idealiser.

There is no idealizer like unavailing regret, all the more if it be a regret of fancy as much as of real feeling.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 67.

ideally (ī-dē′al-i), adv. 1. In idea; in thought.

Factors ideally separated from their combinations.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 321.

Truth to nature can be reached ideally, never historically. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 217.

2. According to an ideal.

idealogic (ī-dē-a-loj′ik), a. See ideologic.

idealogue (ī-dē′a-log), n. See ideologue.

idealogy (ī-dē-al′ō-ji), n. See ideology.

ideal-real (ī-dē′al-rē′al), a. Both ideal and real; having the characteristics of ideal-realism.

The half-and-half systems, the ideal-real, as they are called, held by so many in the present day in Germany, are in the position of a professedly neutral person between two hostile armies, exposed to the fire of both.
New Princeton Rev., I. 22.

ideal-realism (ī-dē′al-rē′al-izm), n. A metaphysical doctrine which combines the principles of idealism and realism. The ideal-realism of Schleiermacher, Beneke, Trendelenburg, Ueberweg, Wundt, and others consists in acknowledging the correctness of Kant's account of the subjective origin of space, time, and the conceptions of cause, substance, and the like, and in holding, in addition, that these things have also an existence altogether independent of the mind. The ideal-realism of Ulrici, B. Peirce, and others consists in the opinion that nature and the mind have such a community as to impart to our guesses a tendency toward the truth, while at the same time they require the confirmation of empirical science.

ideate (ī-dē′āt), v.; pret. and pp. ideated, ppr. ideating. [< idea + -ate[2]. Cf. equiv. Sp. Pg. idear = It. ideare.] I. trans. 1†. To form in idea or thought; fancy.

Letters mingle souls,
For thus friends absent speak. . . . But for these
I could ideate nothing which could please.
Donne, To Sir Henry Wotton.

2. To apprehend mentally so as to retain and be able to recall; fix permanently in the mind. [Rare.]

II. intrans. To form ideas; think.

Feeling in general is . . . the immediate consciousness of the rising or falling of one's power of ideating.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 503.

ideate (ī-dē′āt), a. and n. [< idea + -ate[1].] I. a. In metaph., produced by an idea, specifically by a Platonic idea; existing by virtue of its participation in an idea.

II. n. In metaph., the correlative or object of an idea; the real or actual existence correlating with an idea. G. H. Lewes.

ideation (ī-dē-ā′shon), n. [< ideate + -ion.] The process or the act of forming ideas.

There is in it [the will] an element of conception, ideation, or intellectual retentiveness.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 352.

★ ideational (ī-dē-ā′shon-al), a. [< ideation + -al.] Pertaining to the faculty of ideation, or to the exercise of this faculty; of or pertaining to the formation of ideas.

What has never been presented could hardly be represented, if the ideational process were undisturbed: even in our dreams white negroes or round squares, for instance, never appear. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 62.

ideative (ī-dē′a-tiv), a. [< ideate + -ive.] Same as ideational.

The acoustic images, by awaking in the ideative field the correlated ideas, render the words spoken by another intelligible. Alien. and Neurol. (trans.), VIII. 215.

idelt, a. An obsolete spelling of idle.

idem (ī′dem), adv. [L. idem, m., n., eadem, f., the same, < i-, a pronominal root in is, he, that, etc. (see he[1]), + -dem, a demonstrative suffix; cf. ibidem. Hence identic, etc.] The same; the same as above or before: used to avoid repeating something already written. Abbreviated id.

idemfaciend (ī-dem-fā′shiend), a. [< L. idem, the same, + faciendus, ger. of facere, make, produce: see fact.] Giving itself as product when multiplied by a certain basis. Thus, if i is the basis of a multiple algebra, and j is any other vid such that $ij = j$, then j is said to be idemfaciend.

idemfacient (ī-dem-fā′shient), a. [< L. idem, the same, + facien(t-)s, ppr. of facere, make, produce: see fact.] Giving itself as product when multiplied into a certain basis. Thus, if i is the basis of a multiple algebra, and j is another vid such that $ji = j$, then j is said to be idemfacient.

idemfactor (ī-dem-fak′tor), n. [< L. idem, the same, + factor, one who makes: see factor.] A quantity or symbol which is at once idemfacient and idemfaciend.

idempotent (ī-dem'pō-tent), n. [< L. idem, the same, + potent(t-)s, having power: see potent.] In multiple algebra, a quantity which multiplied into itself gives itself. Ordinary unity is idempotent.

identic (ī-den'tik), a. [Formerly identick, identique, < F. identique = Sp. idéntico = Pg. It. identico (cf. D. G. identisch = Dan. Sw. identisk), < ML. identicus, the same, < L. identi- (in identidem, repeatedly), < idem, the same: see identity.] Same as identical. [Rare.]

> Lady, your bright
> And radiant eyes are in the right;
> The beard's th' identique beard you knew,
> The same numerically true.
> S. Butler, Hudibras, II. i. 149.

> To aggregate the particles of matter in identic shapes.
> Duke of Argyll.

identical (ī-den'ti-kal), a. [< identic + -al.] 1. Being the same; absolutely indistinguishable; distinguishable only as points of view of that which is one in its own being: also used loosely to express the fact that two or more things compared are the same in the particulars considered, or differ in no essential point.

> Absolute justice and absolute love are never antagonistic, but identical.
> Theodore Parker, Love and the Affections.

> I cannot remember a thing that happened a year ago, without a conviction, as strong as memory can give, that I, the same identical person who now remember that event, did then exist. Reid, Intellectual Powers, iii. 1.

> The choice of a representative was once identical with the choice of a chief. Our House of Commons had its roots in local gatherings like those in which uncivilized tribes select head warriors. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 496.

2. Expressing identity.

> That a ton equals a ton is an identical proposition; that the weight of a ton of coals equals the weight of 20 cwt. of stones is an equivalent proposition.
> G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., II. ii. § 80.

Identical equation. See equation.—Identical note, in diplomacy, an official communication in terms agreed upon by two or more governments, each of which sends a copy to some power which they wish to influence or warn by a simultaneous expression of unanimous opinion. —Identical operation, an operation which leaves the operand unchanged.—Identical proposition [ML. propositio identica, a phrase originating with the Scotists in the 14th century], a proposition which is true by virtue of the definitions of the terms together with the rules of formal logic. Thus, "Everything that is at once tall and either a man or a woman is either a tall man or a tall woman," is an identical proposition.

> If those who blame my calling them trifling propositions had but read, and been at the pains to understand, what I had above writ in very plain English, they could not but have seen that by identical propositions I mean only such wherein the same term, importing the same idea, is affirmed of itself: which I take to be the proper signification of identical propositions; and concerning all such, I think I may continue safely to say that to propose them as instructive is no better than trifling. . . . But if men will call propositions identical wherein the same term is not affirmed of itself, whether they speak more properly than I others must judge.
> Locke, Human Understanding, IV. viii. § 3.

★identically (ī-den'ti-kal-i), adv. In an identical manner; with actual or intrinsic sameness: often followed by the same or alike to express absolute sameness or likeness in every particular: as, two identically worded notes; their views are identically the same or alike.—Identically true, in older writings, said of that which is true as a fact by virtue of the identity in existence of the subject and predicate; now used in the sense of that which is true as an identical proposition or equation.

identicalness (ī-den'ti-kal-nes), n. The state or quality of being identical; sameness.

> She has an high opinion of her sex, to think they can charm so long a man so well acquainted with their identicalness. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 201.

identifiable (ī-den'ti-fī-a-bl), a. [< identify + -able.] Capable of being identified.

identification (ī-den″ti-fi-kā'shon), n. [= F. identification = Pg. identificação: see identify and -fication.] 1. The act of making or proving to be the same; the state of being made or regarded as the same.

> I am not ready to admit the identification of the Romish faith with Gospel faith. Bp. Watson, Charge.

> Resemblance itself may be fatal to identification when the law of being is change. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 81.

2. The act or process of establishing the identity of something; the act or process of determining what a given thing is, or who a given person is; specifically, in nat. hist., the determining of the species to which a given specimen belongs; also, the determination thus made.

identify (ī-den'ti-fī), v.; pret. and pp. identified, ppr. identifying. [= F. identifier = Sp. Pg. identificar = It. identificare, identify, < ML. identicus, the same, + L. -ficare, < facere, make: see identic and -fy.] I. trans. 1. To make to be the same; unite or combine in such a manner as to make one; treat as having the same use; consider as the same in effect; represent as the same.

> Let us identify, let us incorporate ourselves with the people. Burke, Economical Reform.

> To identify theology with the doctrine of the supernatural is, as I have pointed out, to narrow the meaning of the word unnaturally. J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 60.

2. To determine or establish the identity of; ascertain that something met with is identical with something otherwise known; ascertain what a given thing or who a given person is; specifically, in nat. hist., to determine to what species a given specimen belongs: as, the child was identified by its clothing; the owner identified his goods.

> Ultima Thule, the furthest of the Britannic Isles, has been identified with all sorts of localities.
> C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 67.

3. To mark or characterize in such a way as to show what the thing marked is; serve as a means of identification for.

> There is here not merely mental arrest but actual conflict; the voice perceived identifies Jacob, at the same time the hands identify Esau.
> J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 62.

To identify one's self with. (a) To regard one's self as being the essence or chief factor of.

> As a statesman, he identified himself with the state.
> Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 25.

(b) To make one's self a part of (an organization, movement, cause, etc.); be conspicuously active in the promotion of: as, he early identified himself with the abolition movement.

II. intrans. To become the same; coalesce in interest, purpose, use, effect, etc. [Rare.]

> An enlightened self-interest, which, when well understood, they tell us, will identify with an interest more enlarged than public. Burke, Rev. in France.

identism (ī-den'tizm), n. [< ident(ic) + -ism.] The system or doctrine of identity: a name applied to the metaphysical theory of Schelling. ★See identity.

identity (ī-den'ti-ti), n. [= F. identité = Sp. identidad = Pg. identidade = It. identità = D. identiteit = G. identität = Dan. Sw. identitet, < ML. identita(t-)s, sameness, < identicus, the same, < L. identi- (in identidem, repeatedly), < idem, the same: see identic and idem.] The state of being the same; absolute sameness; that relation which anything bears to itself; loosely, essential or practical sameness. Properly, identity belongs only to the individual, thing, being, event, etc.

> In no form of government is there an absolute identity of interest between the people and their rulers.
> Macaulay, Mill on Government.

Absolute identity. See absolute.—Generic identity. See generic.—Personal identity. See personal.—Principle of identity, in logic, the general formula A = A. ★=Syn. See sameness.

ideogram (ī'dē-ō-gram), n. [< Gr. ἰδέα, idea, + γράμμα, a writing.] Same as ideograph. ★Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 8.

ideograph (ī'dē-ō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. ἰδέα, an idea, + γράφειν, write.] A character, symbol, or figure which suggests the idea of an object without ★expressing its name.

ideographic (ī″dē-ō-graf'ik), a. [= F. idéographique = Sp. ideográfico; as ideograph + -ic.] Representing ideas directly, and not through the medium of their names: applied specifically to that mode of writing which, by means of symbols, figures, or hieroglyphics, suggests the idea of an object without expressing its name. All written signs are believed to have been ideographic in their origin, as are the Chinese characters, and the hieroglyphics of the ancient Egyptians for the most part.

> The picture-writing of the Mexicans was found to have given birth to a . . . family of ideographic forms.
> H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 19.

> A few years ago a religious work was printed at Vienna in the Mikmak language, in which no less than 5701 ideographic symbols are employed.
> Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 21.

ideographical (ī″dē-ō-graf'i-kal), a. [< ideographic + -al.] Same as ideographic.

ideographically (ī″dē-ō-graf'i-kal-i), adv. In an ideographic manner: as, a sentence expressed ideographically.

ideographics (ī″dē-ō-graf'iks), n. [Pl. of ideographic: see -ics.] A method of writing in ideographic characters. See ideographic.

ideography (ī-dē-og'ra-fi), n. [= F. idéographie = Pg. ideographia, < Gr. ἰδέα, an idea, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The direct representation of ideas by graphic signs. See ideographic.

ideologic (ī″dē-ō-loj'ik), a. [Also idealogic; = F. idéologique = Sp. ideológico = It. ideologico; as ideology + -ic.] Same as ideological.

> His [Napoleon's] hatred of idealogues is well known, but the novel was that species of idealogic composition that came least into collision with the principles of imperialism. Chambers's Encyc.

ideological (ī″dē-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< ideologic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to ideology.

> I would willingly have . . . persevered to the end in the same abstinence which I have hitherto observed from ideological discussions. J. S. Mill, Logic, IV. i. § 4.

2. Relating to or depending on the idea or signification. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 188.

ideologist (ī-dē-ol'ō-jist), n. [= F. idéologiste; as ideolog-y + -ist.] 1. One who is occupied with ideas or ideals that have no real significance or value; one who indulges in theories or speculations, or fabricates ideal schemes.

> As to the cultivated and intelligent liberals of 1789, he consigns them with a word to the place where they belong; they are ideologists: in other words, their pretended knowledge is mere drawing-room prejudice and the imagination of the closet. New Princeton Rev., III. 294.

2. One who advocates the doctrines of ideology.

> The society of ideologists at Auteuil.
> Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 497.

ideologue (ī-dē'ō-log), n. [Also, less correctly, idealogue; < F. idéologue = Sp. ideólogo = Pg. ideologo, < Gr. ἰδέα, idea, + -λόγος, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Same as ideologist.

> Some domestic idealogue, who sits
> And coldly chooses empire, where as well
> He might republic.
> Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

ideology (ī-dē-ol'ō-ji), n. [Also, less correctly, idealogy; < F. idéologie = Sp. ideología = Pg. It. ideologia, < Gr. ἰδέα, idea, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of ideas or of mind; a name applied by the later disciples of the French philosopher Condillac to the history and evolution of human ideas, considered as so many successive forms or modes of certain original or transformed sensations; that system of mental philosophy which derives knowledge exclusively from sensation.

> Our neighbours . . . have made choice of the term ideology . . . to express that department of knowledge which had been called the science of the human mind.
> D. Stewart, Philosophical Essays, iii.

ideomotion (ī″dē-ō-mō'shon), n. [< idea + motion.] In physiol., motion induced by the force of a dominant idea, and neither voluntary nor purely reflex.

ideomotor (ī″dē-ō-mō'tor), a. [< L. idea, idea, + motor, mover.] In physiol., a term applied by Dr. Carpenter to muscular movements resulting from complete engrossment by an idea. These he regarded as automatic, although originating in the cerebrum.

> In this paper he [Dr. Carpenter] also extended the idea of reflex nervous function to the centers of sensation and ideation, and enunciated the fundamental notions of "consensual" and of ideo-motor action.
> Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 548.

ideopraxist (ī″dē-ō-prak'sist), n. [< Gr. ἰδέα, idea, + πρᾶξις, doing (see praxis), + -ist.] One who is impelled to act by the force of an idea; one who devotes his energies to the carrying out of an idea. [Rare.]

> He himself, says the Professor, was among the completest Ideologists, at least Ideopraxists: in the Idea . . . he lived, moved, and fought. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 123.

ides (īdz), n. pl. [In ME. idus, also in sing. ide; F. ides = Sp. idus = Pg. idus, idos = It. idi = G. idus, etc., = Gr. εἰδοί, < L. īdūs, often eidus, pl. of unused sing. īdŭs* (īdu-), the ides.] In the ancient Roman calendar, the eighth day after the nones — that is, the 13th of January, February, April, June, August, September, November, and December, and the 15th of March, May, July, and October. The seven days after the nones in each month are identified by their ordinal numbers before the ides (the ides themselves included), as the eighth, seventh, sixth, etc., day before the ides.

> A soothsayer bids you beware the ides of March.
> Shak., J. C., i. 2.

id est (id est). [L.: id, neut. of is, he, that, = Goth. is, he (see he[1] and hit[2], now it); est = E. is.] That is; that is to say: usually written ★with the abbreviation i. e.

Idia (id'i-ȧ), n. [NL. (Meigen, 1826), < Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar: see idiom.] A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Muscidæ. They are of medium size and blackish-gray color, sometimes reddish-yellow on the abdomen. The eyes are naked; the antennæ are appressed, with the third joint half as long again as the second; the bristle is comb-like; the legs are slim and slightly hairy; the middle tibiæ are naked on the inner side; the wings have no marginal thorn; and the abdomen is of a flattened, round-oval figure. The species abound in tropical countries: one is European and another North American.

idiasm (id'i-azm), n. [< Gr. ἰδιασμός, peculiarity, < ἰδιάζειν, be peculiar, < ἴδιος, peculiar: see idiom.] A peculiarity.

The idioms, idiotisms, and, above all, the idiasms of Shakespeare will be thoroughly understood, and so much that now goes by the board in all modern editions will be restored with intelligent reverence.
C. M. Ingleby, Shakespeare: the Man and the Book, I. 118.

idio-. [L. idio-, < Gr. ἰδιο-, one's own, private, peculiar: see idiom.] An element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'one's own,' 'private,' 'peculiar.'

idioblast (id'i-ō-blast), n. [< Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + βλαστός, offshoot.] A term proposed by Sachs for certain individual cells or tissue-elements which differ greatly, as regards their contents, from the surrounding tissues. Such are the resin-cells, tannin-cells, crystal-cells, etc., found in various plants.

idiocrasy (id-i-ok'rā-si), n. [= F. idiocrasie, idiocrase, < Gr. ἰδιοκρασία, a peculiar temperament, < ἴδιος, one's own, peculiar (see idiom), + κρᾶσις, mixture, temperament: see crasis.] Peculiarity of physical or mental constitution; that temperament or vital state which is peculiar to a person; idiosyncrasy. [Rare.]

idiocratic (id″i-ō-krat'ik), a. [< idiocrasy (-crat-) + -ic; cf. aristocratic.] Peculiar in respect of constitution or temperament; idiosyncratic.

idiocratical (id″i-ō-krat'i-kal), a. [< idiocratic + -al.] Same as idiocratic.

idiocy (id'i-ō-si), n. [Also idiotcy, < idiot + -cy; not directly < Gr. ἰδιωτεία, uncouthness, want of education, also private life or business, < ἰδιώτης, a private person, etc.: see idiot.] The state of being an idiot; natural absence or marked defect of understanding; mental imbecility. See idiot.

I will undertake to convict a man of idiocy if he can not see the proof that three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. F. W. Robertson.

idiocyclophanous (id″i-ō-sī-klof'a-nus), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + κύκλος, circle, + -φανης, < φαίνεσθαι, appear.] Same as idiophanous.

Idiodactylæ (id″i-ō-dak'ti-lē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + δάκτυλος, finger, toe.] In Sundevall's system, a group of oscine passerine birds related to the crows, consisting of the birds of paradise and sundry others, and constituting the fourth family of the cohort Coliomorphæ.

idiodinic (id″i-ō-din'ik), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + ὠδίς, the pangs of labor.] In zoöl., reproducing or bringing forth by means of a special pore or opening of the body devoted exclusively to this function, and through which the genital products are extruded. When idiodinic animals have a special gonaduct, this is called an idiogonaduct.

The Porodinic group is divisible into Nephrodinic and Idiodinic, in the former the nephridium serving as a pore, in the latter a special (ἴδιος) pore being developed.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 682.

idioelectric (id″i-ō-ē-lek'trik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, peculiar, + E. electric.] I. a. Electric by virtue of its own peculiar properties, or manifesting electricity in its natural state.

II. n. A term introduced by Gilbert for those substances which become electrified by friction, in distinction from anelectric. This distinction was, however, based upon the erroneous idea that certain substances (as metals) could not be electrified in this way.

idioglottic (id″i-ō-glot'ik), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + γλωττικός, of the tongue: see glottic[1].] Using words or names invented in one's own mind.

The boy soon gave up his idioglottic endeavors, learning German before his next-born sister had reached the age of beginning speech. Science, XII. 146.

idiogonaduct (id″i-ō-gon'a-dukt), n. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + E. gonaduct, q. v.] The gonaduct of an idiodinic animal.

The genital ducts of idiodinic forms may be called idiogonaducts, as distinguished from the nephrogonaducts of nephrodinic forms. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 682.

idiograph (id'i-ō-gràf), n. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + γράφειν, write.] A mark or signature peculiar to an individual; a private mark or trade-mark.

idiographic (id″i-ō-graf'ik), a. [< idiograph + -ic.] Pertaining to or consisting of an idiograph or idiographs.

idiogynous (id-i-oj'i-nus), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. pistil).] In bot., not having a pistil.

idiolatry (id-i-ol'a-tri), n. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + λατρεία, worship.] Self-worship; excessive self-esteem. [Rare.]

Idolatry . . . differs but a letter with idiolatry.
Bp. Andrews, Ninety-six Sermons, II. 393 (ed. 1841–44).

idiom (id'i-um), n. [Formerly also ideom; D. idioom = G. Dan. Sw. idiom = F. idiome = Sp. Pg. It. idioma, < LL. idioma, < Gr. ἰδίωμα, a peculiarity, property, a peculiar phraseology, idiom, < ἰδιοῦσθαι, make one's own, appropriate to oneself, < ἴδιος, one's own, private, personal, peculiar, separate, in older Gr. Fίδιος, prob. for Fεδιος*, σFεδιος*, σFεjος* (= L. suus, one's own, his, her, etc.), connected with σφεῖς, acc. σφέας, σφε, they, and with οὐ, = L. sui, of oneself: see sui generis.] 1. A mode of expression peculiar to a language; a peculiarity of phraseology; a phrase or form of words approved by the usage of a language, whether written or spoken, and often having a signification other than its grammatical or logical one. See idiotism, 1.

There are certain idioms, certain forms of speech, certain propositions, which the Holy Ghost repeats several times, upon several occasions in the Scriptures.
Donne, Sermons, vi.

Some that with Care true Eloquence shall teach,
And to just Idioms fix our doubtful Speech.
Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 34.

2. The genius or peculiar cast of a language; hence, a peculiar form or variation of language; a dialect.

The beautiful Provençal, . . . more rich and melodious than any other idiom in the Peninsula.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., Int.

=Syn. 2. Dialect, Diction, etc. See language.

idiomatic (id″i-ō-mat'ik), a. [= F. idiomatique = Sp. idiomático = Pg. It. idiomatico (cf. G. idiomatisch = Dan. Sw. idiomatisk), < NL. idiomaticus, < Gr. ἰδιωματικός, peculiar, characteristic, < ἰδίωμα(τ-), a peculiarity, idiom: see idiom.] 1. Peculiar to or characteristic of a certain language; pertaining to or exhibiting the particular cast of a language or its characteristic modes of expression.—2. Given to or marked by the use of idioms: as, an idiomatic writer.

Now, there is not in the world so certain a guarantee for pure idiomatic diction, without tricks or affectation, as a case of genuine excitement. De Quincey, Style, i.

Like most idiomatic as distinguished from correct writers, he [Dryden] knew very little about the language historically or critically.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 76.

idiomatical (id″i-ō-mat'i-kal), a. [< idiomatic + -al.] Idiomatic.

Milton mistakes the idiomatical use and meaning of "munditiæ."
T. Warton, Milton's Smaller Poems, Horace, i. 5.

His enthusiastic mode of thinking, and his foreign and idiomatical manner of expressing himself, often excited a smile on the grave cheek of the count.
Scott, Quentin Durward, xxv.

idiomatically (id″i-ō-mat'i-kal-i), adv. In an idiomatic manner; according to the idiom of a language.

idiomorphic (id″i-ō-môr'fik), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + μορφή, form.] Having its own or characteristic form. This term was introduced into lithology by Rosenbusch, to indicate that a mineral forming part of a rock-mass has the crystalline faces which belong to it as a species, and that it has not been forced by the other minerals with which it is associated to take their form more or less completely.

The normal plutonic rocks are characterized by a structure in which idiomorphic constituents occur only in small proportion. Geol. Mag., 3d dec., IV. 123.

idiomorphically (id″i-ō-môr'fi-kal-i), adv. In an idiomorphic manner.

All of the constituents are idiomorphically developed.
Amer. Naturalist, XXII. 209.

idiomuscular (id″i-ō-mus'kū-lär), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + E. muscular.] Pertaining to muscle exclusively.—Idiomuscular contraction, the contraction of muscular fibers when struck. The local wheal which appears at the point struck, and usually remains there, but sometimes divides and travels off in either direction as a sluggish wave, is called the local, and the contraction of the entire band of fibers to the ends of the muscle the general idiomuscular contraction.

idiopathetic (id″i-ō-pa-thet'ik), a. [< idiopathy, after pathetic, q. v.] Same as idiopathic.

idiopathetically (id″i-ō-pa-thet'i-kal-i), adv. Same as idiopathically.

idiopathic (id″i-ō-path'ik), a. [< idiopath-y + -ic.] In pathol., of or pertaining to a primary morbid state; not secondary or arising from any other disease: as, an idiopathic affection: opposed to symptomatic.—Idiopathic anemia, fever, etc. See the nouns.

idiopathical (id″i-ō-path'i-kal), a. Same as idiopathic.

idiopathically (id″i-ō-path'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner of an idiopathic disease; not symptomatically.

idiopathy (id-i-op'a-thi), n.; pl. idiopathies (-thiz). [= F. idiopathie = Sp. idiopatía = Pg. idiopathia = It. idiopatia, < Gr. ἰδιοπάθεια, feeling for oneself alone, < ἰδιοπαθής, affected for oneself in a peculiar way, < ἴδιος, one's own (see idiom), + πάθος, feeling, affection.] 1. In pathol., an idiopathic character of disease; a morbid state or condition not preceded and occasioned by any other disease.—2†. An individual or personal state of feeling; a mental condition peculiar to one's self.

Men are so full of their own fancies and idiopathies that they scarce have the civility to interchange any words with a stranger. Dr. H. More, Psychathanasia, Pref.

idiophanism (id-i-of'a-nizm), n. [< idiophan-ous + -ism.] The property of being idiophanous.

idiophanous (id-i-of'a-nus), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + -φανης, < φαίνεσθαι, appear.] Exhibiting axial interference figures without the use of polarizing apparatus: said of certain crystals, as epidote. These figures are sometimes called epoptic figures. Also idiocyclophanous.

Idiophyllum (id″i-ō-fil'um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + φύλλον, leaf.] A generic name proposed by Lesquereux in 1879 for a fossil plant, from the Allegheny Coal Measures at Mazon Creek, Illinois, having the aspect of a small round or broadly obovate leaf, the areolation of which resembled that of the Mesozoic genus Dictyophyllum. Subsequent examination of the fossil has shown it to be a fern of another genus, probably Neuropteris, in vernation.

idioplasm (id'i-ō-plazm), n. [< NL. idioplasma, < Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + πλάσμα, a thing formed: see plasma.] 1. The directive matter of a cell. According to Nägeli, most of the material of the body of a cell or of an organism is passive (trophoplasm), but traversed in all directions by a continuous network of directive matter, or idioplasm.

2. According to Weismann, the substance of inheritance. Ancestral idioplasm, or germ-plasm, is the substance of inheritance of the whole organism, and is handed on from generation to generation in successive germ-cells, while each cell that is formed during individual development is furnished with its own specific sort of idioplasm by heterokinesis or differential cell-division. See doctrine of ★germ-plasm (in the supplement).

idiopsychological (id″i-ō-sī-kō-loj'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + E. psychological.] Of or pertaining to one's own mind. F. L. Patton.

idiorepulsive (id″i-ō-rē-pul'siv), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + E. repulsive.] Repelling itself.

The early theories regarded [electrical] phenomena as produced either by a single fluid, idio-repulsive, but attractive of all matter, or else as produced by two fluids, each idio-repulsive, but attractive of the other.
W. R. Grove, Corr. of Forces, p. 83.

idiorrhythmic (id″i-ō-rith'mik), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + ῥυθμός, rhythm.] Self-regulated; consisting of self-governing members: an epithet of those convents of the Greek Church in which each member of the community is left to regulate his own manner of life. Also written idiorhythmic.

In an idiorrhythmic monastery each monk lives as he pleases; if rich he has a suite of apartments, if poor he shares a cell with a brother. Discipline is kept up by public opinion rather than by authority; a monk is not bound to attend vespers, but if he omitted to do so two days running without valid excuse his brethren would begin to talk about his laxity and show signs of disapproval. Instead of an abbot an idiorrhythmic convent is governed by a deliberative assembly and two or three annually elected presidents. Athelstan Riley, Athos, or the Mountain of the [Monks (1887), p. 66.

idiostatic (id″i-ō-stat'ik), a. [< Gr. ἴδιος, one's own, + στατικός, static: see static.] Pertaining to a mode of measurement of electricity in which no auxiliary electrification is employed.

The accessory electrometer or gauge is called an idiostatic electrometer.
J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 56.

idiosyncrasy (id″i-ō-sin'krā-si), n.; pl. idiosyncrasies (-siz). [= F. idiosyncrasie = Sp. It. idiosincrasia = Pg. idiosyncrasia, < Gr. ἰδιοσυγκρασία, also ἰδιοσύγκρασις, a peculiar temperament or habit of body, < ἴδιος, one's own, peculiar, + σύγκρασις, a mixture, tempering, < συγκεραννύναι, mix with, < σύν, with, + κεραννύναι, mix, > κρᾶσις, a mixing: see crasis.] A peculiarity of mental or physical constitution or temperament; characteristic susceptibility or antipathy inherent in an individual; special mental disposition or tendency.

I have no antipathy, or rather idio-syncrasy, in diet, humour, air, anything. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 1.

That I am fond of indulging, beyond a hope of sympathy, in such retrospection, may be the symptom of some sickly idiosyncrasy. Lamb, New Year's Eve.

Idiosyncrasies are, however, frequent; thus we find one person has an exceptional memory for sounds, another for colours, another for forms.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 61.

idiosyncratic (id″i-ō-sin-krat′ik), a. [< idiosyncrasy (-crat-) + -ic.] Relating or pertaining to idiosyncrasy; of or arising from individual disposition or susceptibility: as, idiosyncratic sympathy.

Only by comparison are we able to generalize, and to discover what is idiosyncratic in these manifestations.
J. Nelson, Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 374.

★ Both sensory and non-sensory hallucinations . . . are idiosyncratic and unshared. E. Gurney, Mind, X. 162.

idiot (id′i-ọt), n. and a. [Formerly also ideot; < ME. idiot, ydiot = D. idioot = G. Dan. Sw. idiot, < OF. idiot, F. idiot = Sp. Pg. It. idiota, an idiot, < L. idiota, an uneducated, ignorant, inexperienced, common person, < Gr. ἰδιώτης, a private person, a common man, one who has no professional knowledge, an ignorant, ill-informed man, < ἰδιοῦσθαι, make one's own, < ἴδιος, one's own, peculiar: see idiom.] I. n. 1†. A private person.

St. Austin affirmed that the plain places of Scripture are sufficient to all laics, and all idiots or private persons.
Jer. Taylor.

2†. An unlearned, ignorant, or simple person.

Estwarde and westwarde I awayted after faste,
And 3ede forth as an ydiote in contre to aspye
After Pieres the Plowman.
Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 170.

Christ was received of idiots, of the vulgar people, and of the simpler sort. Blount.

3†. A fool or dupe; one who is fooled.

Wenest thou make an ydiot of our dame?
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 311.

4†. A professional fool; a jester; a clown.

The ideot likes with bables for to plaie; . . .
A motley coate, a cockescombe, or a bell,
Hee better likes then Jewelles that excell.
G. Whitney, Emblems (1586), p. 31.

The head of an ideot dressed in a cap and bells, and gaping in a most immoderate manner. Spectator, No. 47.

5. A human being destitute of the ordinary mental powers; one who is born without understanding or discernment, or who has utterly lost it by disease, so as to have no lucid intervals; one who, by deficiency of the intellectual faculties, is unfit for the social condition, or for taking care of himself in danger.

Genetous idiots are rarely physically well made. They appear to have received, in many instances, with the heritage of a defective brain, an enfeebled, dwarfed, often crippled body. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 92.

6. In old Eng. law, one who has been without understanding or reasoning powers from his birth, as distinguished from a lunatic. "At the present day idiocy is considered as a species of insanity or lunacy." (Rapalje and Lawrence.)

An idiot, or natural fool, is one that hath had no understanding from his nativity. Blackstone, Com., I. viii.

II. a. Afflicted with or indicating idiocy; idiotic.

The tale of Betty Foy,
The idiot mother of an idiot boy.
Byron, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Ye mar a comely face with idiot tears.
Tennyson, Geraint.

Idiot stitch, a name given to tricot stitch in crochet. Dict. of Needlework.

idiot (id′i-ọt), v. t. [< idiot, n.] To make or render idiotic.

And being much befool'd and idioted
By the rough amity of the other, sank
As into sleep again. Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

An idiom; a peculiarity of phrase; a current deviation or departure from the strict syntactical rules or usages of a language.

Scholars . . . sometimes . . . give terminations and idiotisms suitable to their native language unto words newly invented or translated out of other languages.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 165.

When they [the apostles] came therefore to talk of the great doctrines of the cross, to preach up the astonishing truths of the Gospel; they brought to be sure their old idiotisms and plainness of speech along with them.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. ix.

The expression "in or with respect" is an idiotism.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 85.

2. A personal peculiarity of expression. [Rare.]

Idiotism, or the use which is confined to an individual.
H. N. Day, Art of Discourse, § 287.

3. Idiocy; the state of being an idiot. [Rare.]

To say that this matter [the earth] was the cause of itself, this, of all other, were the greatest idiotism.
Raleigh, Hist. World, Pref., p. 49.

If in reality his philosophy be foreign to the matter professed, . . . it must be somewhat worse than mere ignorance or idiotism.
Shaftesbury, Advice to an Author, iii. § 1.

The soul sinks into a kind of sleepy idiotism, and is diverted by toys and baubles. Goldsmith, Taste.

idiotize (id′i-ọt-īz), v. i.; pret. and pp. idiotized, ppr. idiotizing. [< idiot + -ize. Cf. Gr. ἰδιωτίζειν, put into common language: see idiotism.] To become stupid. [Rare.]

idiotry (id′i-ọt-ri), n. [< idiot + -ry.] Idiocy. [Rare.]

idiotype (id′i-ō-tīp), n. [< Gr. ἴδιος, peculiar, + τύπος, type.] An object or a substance typical of a class; one of a series exhibiting like peculiarities. "A term applied by Guthrie (Chem. Soc. Jour., xiii. 35) to bodies derived by replacement from the same substance, including the typical substance itself; ammonia, for example, is idiotypic with ethylamine, phenylamine, and all the organic bases derived from it by substitution, and these are idiotypic one with the other. The same term was applied by Wackenroder (J pr. Chem., xxiv. 18) to certain non-crystalline organic bodies which, according to his observations, exhibit certain similarities of structure." (Watts.) idiotypic (id″i-ō-tip′ik), a. [< idiotype + -ic.] Of or related to a particular class or type. See ★idiotype.

idle (ī′dl), a. and n. [< ME. idel, < AS. īdel, empty, useless, vain, = OS. īdal, īdil = OFries. īdel = D. ijdel, vain, frivolous, trifling, = MLG. Dozing out all his idle noons, And ev'ry night at play.
Cowper, Epitaph on a Hare.

2. Not engaged in any occupation or employment; unemployed; inactive; doing nothing.

The bee has thre kyndis [characteristics]. Ane es that scho es neuer ydill.
Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 8.

Why stand ye here all the day idle? Mat. xx. 6.

The Queen sat idle by her loom.
D. G. Rossetti, Staff and Scrip.

3. In a state of disuse; remaining unused.

Of antres vast, and desarts idle,
Rough quarries, rocks, and hills whose heads touch heaven,
It was my hint to speak. Shak., Othello, i. 3.

The idle spear and shield were high up hung.
Milton, Nativity, l. 55.

4. Useless; ineffectual; vain; bootless; unavailing; futile: as, idle rage.

They pass by me as the idle wind,
Which I respect not. Shak., J. C., iv. 3.

Apologies are idle things; I will not trouble you with them. Washington, in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 400.

Yet life I hold but idle breath,
When love or honour's weighed with death.
Scott, L. of the L., iv. 17.

5. Of no importance; trivial; irrelevant; flippant; pointless; unprofitable: as, an idle story.

He did not smile, and say to himself that this was an idle whim. O. W. Holmes, A Mortal Antipathy, vi.

Honour and shame, truth, lies, and weal and woe,
Seemed idle words, whose meaning none might know.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 302.

6. Acting idly or unconcernedly; careless; indifferent.

They are coming to the play; I must be idle.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2.

7. Slothful; given to rest and ease; averse to labor; lazy: as, an idle fellow.

Ford and Dekker, Witch of Edmonton, iv. 2.

Idle worms†, worms which were believed or humorously said to breed in the fingers of an idle person.

Keep thy hands in thy muff, and warm the idle worms in thy fingers' ends. Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, iii. 1.

Shakspere refers to this belief in the following passage:

Her waggoner, a small gray-coated gnat,
Not half so big as a round little worm
Prick'd from the lazy finger of a maid.
Shak., R. and J., i. 4.

To run idle, to run loose, without transmitting power or producing effect: said of parts of machinery, as a loose pulley, which serves only to preserve a strain on the driving-belt. = Syn. 6 and 7. Inactive, Inert, Idle, Lazy, Indolent, Slothful, Sluggish. The first three of these words are not necessarily unfavorable in meaning; the next four are always so. Circumstances may make a man inactive; he may be idle for lack of work, or may rest from toil by taking an idle hour; disease may leave him quite inert; but it is blameworthy to be lazy, etc. Fabius showed a masterly inactivity in opposition to Hannibal, but one may be inactive when he ought to be at work. All the words often apply to character or temperament, and the last four always do so. To be inert is to be like dead matter, destitute of motion or activity. To be idle is to be unemployed, whether through necessity, need of rest, passing fancy, or permanent disposition. To be lazy is to have a strong repugnance to physical exertion, and especially to continued application. Slothful and sluggish express slowness of movement and a corresponding temperament or disposition. See listless.

II.† n. 1. Idleness; indolence.

His brains rich Talent buries not in Idle.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

2. An indolent person.

Young Boies and Girles Saluages, or any other, bee they neuer such idles, may turne, carie, or returne a fish, without either shame or any great paine.
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 189.

In idle†, in vain.

Eterne God, that thurgh thy purveiaunce
Ledest the world by certein governaunce,
In ydel, as men seyn, ye nothyng make.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 139.

Goddis name in ydil take thou not.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 104.

To be sick of the idles†, to be lazy. Nares.

Hodie nullam lineam duxi: I have beene sicke of the idles to-day. Withals, Dict. (ed. 1634), p. 558.

idle (ī'dl), v.; pret. and pp. idled, ppr. idling. [< ME. idlen, < AS. idlian, become useless (in comp. ā-īdlian, make useless or vain), < īdel, idle: see idle, a.] I. intrans. To spend or waste time in inaction or without employment.

Finding by experience that many times idlenesse is lesse harmefull then vnprofitable occupation.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 258.

Either to have it steril with idleness, or manured with industry. Shak., Othello, i. 3.

=Syn. See idle.

idle-pated† (ī'dl-pā″ted), a. [< idle + pate + *-ed*²; in part a perversion of addle-pated, q. v.] Idle-headed; foolish; stupid.

Let him be found never so idle-pated, he is still a grave drunkard. Sir T. Overbury, Characters, A Sexton.

idler (īd'lėr), n. [< idle, v., + *-er*¹.] 1. One who idles; one who spends his time in inaction, or without occupation or employment; a lounging or lazy person; a sluggard.

An idler is a watch that wants both hands,
As useless if it goes as when it stands.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 681.

2. (a) Naut., a member of a ship's crew who is not required to keep night-watch.

Now a days, so irksome idless' slights
And cursed charms have witch'd each student's mind,
That death it is to any of them all,
If that their hands to penning you do call.
Greene, Alphonsus, i.

idleton (ī'dl-tọn), n. [< idle + -ton, as in simpleton.] A lazy person. [Prov. Eng.]

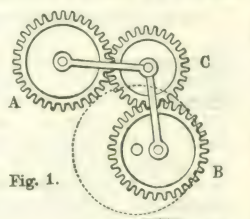
idle-wheel (ī'dl-hwēl), n. 1. A wheel (C, fig. 1) placed between two others (A and B) for the purpose of transferring the motion from one axis to the other without change of direction; a carrier-wheel. If A and B were in contact, they would revolve in opposite directions; but in consequence of the intermediate axis of C they revolve in the same direction, and without any change of the velocity-ratio of the pair.



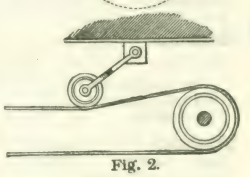


Fig. 1.

2. A wheel that performs a duty other than the transmission of power, as the preservation of a strain on a belt, etc. In fig. 2 the small wheel rests upon the belt to maintain its tension, and runs idly, transmitting no power to other parts of the machine.

And this idolatrous grove of images, this flasket of idols, which I will pull down.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iii. 1.

idolatrously (ī-dol'a-trus-li), adv. In an idolatrous manner; with undue reverence or affection.

idolatry (ī-dol'a-tri), n.; pl. idolatries (-triz). [< ME. idolatrie, < OF. idolatrie, F. idolâtrie = Pr. ydolatria = Sp. idolatría = Pg. It. idolatria, < ML. idolatria, contr. of LL. idololatria, < Gr. εἰδωλολατρεία, idolatry, < εἰδωλολάτρης, an idolater: see idolater.] 1 The worship of idols or images; more generally, the paying of divine honors to any material object considered as the representative of supernatural powers.

And, were there sense in his idolatry,
My substance should be statue in thy stead.
Shak., T. G. of V., IV. 4. 205.

Swear by thy gracious self,
Which is the god of my idolatry.
Shak., R. and J., II. 2. 114.

What some fools are made by art,
They were by nature, atheists, head and heart.
The gross idolatry blind heathens teach
Was too refin'd for them, beyond their reach.
Cowper, Hope, l. 499.

Scientifically defined, idolatry is a mode of thought under which all causation is attributed to entities.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 330.

2. Immoderate veneration or love for any person or thing; admiration bordering on adoration.

Let not my love be call'd idolatry,
Nor my beloved as an idol show.
Shak., Sonnets, cv.

I loved the man [Shakspere], and do honour his memory on this side idolatry as much as any.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

And I, with wild Idolatry,
Begin [my prayers] to God, and end them all to Thee.
Cowley, The Mistress, The Thief.

idolet (ī'dol-et), n. [< idol + -et.] A small idol. [Rare.]

idol-fire (ī'dol-fīr), n. A fire burned in honor of an idol, or on a pagan altar. [Rare.]

idolographical (ī-dol-ō-graf'i-kal), a. [< Gr. εἰδωλον, idol, + γράφειν, write, + -ic-al.] Treating of idols or idolatry. [Rare.]

I should have looked at some of the Lisbon idols with more satisfaction if I had been acquainted with their adventures, as recorded in this extraordinary idolographical work. Southey, Letters (1826), III. 539.

idolon, idolum (ī-dō'lon, -lum), n.; pl. idola (-lä). [NL., < L. idolum, < Gr. εἰδωλον, an image, phantom: see idol.] 1. An image.—2. A false mental image or conception; a mistaken notion; a fallacy. See idol, 4.

It is a treatise on the wisdom needed for the management of the individual mind, so as that it may overcome the idola or common tendencies to error against which Bacon had warned mankind. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 757.

Those who read without acquiring distinct images of the things about which they read, by the help of their own senses, gather no real knowledge, but conceive mere phantoms and idola. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 5.

We avoid the "idola specus" by trusting Common Sense, but what is to guard us against the "idola tribus"?
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 137.

Also spelled eidolon.

idolothytic (ī-dol-ō-thit'ik), a. [< Gr. εἰδωλόθυτα, meats sacrificed to idols, neut. pl. of εἰδωλόθυτος, sacrificed to idols, < εἰδωλον, idol, + θυτός, verbal adj. of θύειν, sacrifice.] Permitting the eating of meats sacrificed to idols. [Rare.]

Those who assert the lawfulness of eating meat offered to idols—whether they are Gnostics or not, these last I have called idolothytic Christians, because I cannot devise a better name, not because it is strictly defensible etymologically. Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXV. 495.

idolous† (ī'dol-us), a. [< idol + -ous.] Idol-like; heathenish.

When such an image or idolouse prince is thus vp set or constituted by authoritie, he maye in no wyse speake, but oute of that spirit y[t] their coniurers, confessours I shuld sai, haue put into him.
Bp. Bale, Image of the Two Churches, ii.

He expresses his conception and idea for the judicious collocation, idoneous and apt disposition, right casting and contrivement, of the several parts and rooms, according to their distinct offices and uses.
Evelyn, Architects and Architecture.

Especially if, on the same sheet of paper, some other fit mineral water or idoneous liquor be likewise dropped.
Boyle, Works, IV. 806.

idorgan (id'ôr-gan), n. [< Gr iδ(έα), idea, + ὄργανον, organ.] A morphological individual or morphon of the second grade of individuality, composed of cells combined into tissues and organs and itself forming one of the structural units in the body of an individual of a higher grade. An idorgan may or may not be an organ in the functional or physiological sense. The two halves of the human body, the five arms of a starfish, the segments of a medusa, are idorgans which are not physiological organs, while the last segment of the body of the lobster is both a structural idorgan and a functional swimming-organ.

Idotea (ī-dō'tē-ä), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1793), prop. Idothea, < Gr. Εἰδοθέα, Εἰδοθέη, a sea-goddess, daughter of Proteus.] The typical genus of Idoteidæ. I. irrorata is a marine species of wide distribution in the northern hemisphere, abundant in tide-pools along the North Atlantic coast. Also written Idothea, Eidotea, Eidothea.

Idotea irrorata, natural size.

Idoteidæ (ī-dō-tē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Idotea + -idæ.] A family of cursorial isopods, typified by the genus Idotea. These small and slender marine crustaceans have 4 antennæ in the same horizontal line, the outer pair of which have a long many-jointed filament; the branchial operculum is well developed; several of the abdominal segments are united in a terminal plate or caudal shield; and the last pair of abdominal legs is modified into an annulate operculum. Idotea, Chiridotea, and Arcturus are leading genera. Some of the species are known as box-slaters. Also Arcturidæ and Idoteoides.

idoteiform (ī-dō-tē'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Idotea + L. forma, form.] In entom., resembling the Idoteidæ. Applied by Kirby to certain unidentified Brazilian larvæ of flattened form, and with the last abdominal segment greatly enlarged, found under bark in Brazil; they probably belong to the coleopterous family Histeridæ.

A genus of crustaceans.—4. A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Ortalidæ. Loew, 1873.

Idunæ (i-dū'nē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Iduna.] A group of warblers taking name from the genus Iduna. H. Seebohm, 1881.

idust, n. [ME., < L. idus: see ide[2], ides.] Same as ides.

The last Idus of March, after the yeer.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 39.

Idyia (i-dī'yä), n. [NL. (also Idya), < Gr. εἰδυία, fem. of εἰδώς, part. of εἰδέναι, know, 2d perf. of εἰδειν*, know, ἰδεῖν, see: see idea.] 1. (a) A notable genus of comb-bearing jelly-fishes or ctenophorans, of the family Beroidæ. (b) [l. c.] A species of this genus.

One of the most beautiful of all the jelly-fishes is the rose-colored idyia. It attains a length of three or four inches, and in form is not very unlike an elongated melon with one end cut square off. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 320.

2. A genus of crustaceans.

idyl (ī'dil), n. [Also written idyll; = D. G. idylle = Dan. idyl = Sw. idyll, < F. idylle = Sp. idilio = Pg. idyllio = It. idillio, < L. idyllium, edyllium, < Gr. εἰδύλλιον, a short, highly wrought descriptive poem, mostly on pastoral subjects, < εἶδος, a form, shape, figure, image (see idol), + dim. term. -ύλλιον.] 1. Primarily, a poem descriptive of rural scenes and events; a pastoral or rural poem, like the idyls of Theocritus, Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," or Burns's

"Cottar's Saturday Night": applied also to longer poems of a descriptive and narrative character, as Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," and to prose compositions of similar purport treated in a poetic style.

> I heard her turn the page; she found a small > Sweet Idyl, and once more, as low, she read.
> Tennyson, Princess, vii.

[Tennyson spells the word in both ways, as here given.]

2. An episode, or a series of events or circumstances of pastoral or rural simplicity, fit for an idyl.—3. In music, a composition, usually instrumental, of a pastoral or sentimental character.

idylist, idyllist (ī'dil-ist), n. [< idyl + -ist.] A writer of idyls; an idyllic poet or writer; one who depicts idyllic or pastoral subjects, as a painter.

ield†, v. t. An obsolete form of yield.

-ier[1]. [Also -yer; < ME. -ier, -yer, -iere, being the suffix -er[1] preceded by -i-, formative of weak verbs in AS. -ian, ME. -ien, -en: see -en[1].] A suffix denoting the agent, the same as -er[1] with an original verb-formative preceding. It appears in brazier[1], grazier, hellier = hillier, and, spelled -yer, in hillyer, another spelling of hillier, and lowyer, an obsolete or dialectal variant of lower. In bowyer, lawyer, sawyer, the suffix -yer is slightly different. See -yer.

-ier[2] (-ēr'). [< F. -ier, ult. < L. -arius: see -er[2] and -eer.] Another form of the suffix -eer, retaining the French spelling, and occurring in more recent words from the French, as in brigadier, halberdier, etc. See -eer, -er[2].

ier-oe (ēr-ō'), n. [Sc., < Gael. iar-ogha, a great-grandchild, < iar, = Ir. iar, after, + ogha = Ir. ua, a grandchild: see o[6] and oe.] A great-grandchild. [Scotch.]

> Till his wee curlie John's ier-oe,
> When ebbing life nae mair shall flow,
> The last sad mournful rites bestow.
> Burns, Dedication to Gavin Hamilton.

if (if), conj. [= Sc. gif, < ME. if, ef, yef, gif, gef, North. gif, gef, < AS. gif = OS. ef, of = OFries. gef,ief, ef, of, if = D. of, or, if, whether, but, = OHG. ibu, oba, ube, upa, upi, MHG. obe, ob, op, G. ob, if, whether, = Icel. if, ef, if, = Goth. iba, ibai, whether, perhaps; with negative, niba, nibai, if not, unless, in comp. jabai (< jah, and, also, + ibai, the contraction of jah with the radical i explaining the other Teut. forms with initial o or u), if; orig. the dat. or instr. case ('on the condition') of a noun represented by OHG. iba, condition, stipulation, doubt, = Icel. if, ef, neut., ifi, efi, m., doubt, hesitation, > ifa, efa, v., doubt, = Sw. jäf, an exception, challenge, > jäfva, make an exception against, challenge. The notion to which Horne Tooke gave currency, that if, AS. gif, was orig. the impv. of the verb give (AS. gifan, impv. gif), in the assumed sense of 'grant, suppose,' has no foundation in fact.] 1. In case that; granting, allowing, or supposing that; on condition that: used in introducing a conditional sentence or clause: as, I will go if you do; if he is there, I shall see him. In logic that which the conditional proposition expresses is such knowledge that the additional knowledge of the fact expressed in the clause introduced by if would give us the knowledge of the fact expressed in the other clause. "If A happens, B happens," implies not only that whenever A happens B happens, in the actual circumstances, but that it would do so under a certain variation of circumstances from those which actually occur. Thus, "if I were to throw my inkstand on the floor, I should spoil the carpet," and "if the result of throwing the inkstand on the floor would be to spoil the carpet, I shall not throw it on the floor," may both be true at once, although in logical form the propositions appear to conflict.

> Lowell, Agassiz, vi. 2.

> I know not if to pray > Still to be what I am, or yield, and be > Like all the other men I see.
> M. Arnold, A Summer Night.

3. Although; notwithstanding that: as, I am honest, if I am poor; he is strong, if he is little. If, like and, but, and other conjunctions, is sometimes used as a noun, with reference to sentences so beginning.

> What, quod the protectour, thou seruest me I wene wt iffes & with andes, I tel the thei haue so done, & that I will make good on thy body traituor.
> Sir T. More, Works (1577), p. 55.

> And you may avoid that too, with an If. I knew when seven justices could not take up a quarrel, but when the parties were met themselves, one of them thought but of an If, as, "If you said so, then I said so"; and they shook hands and swore brothers. ighe†, n. A Middle English variant of eye[1].

ight†. A Middle English form of ought, obsolete preterit of owe.

igloo (ig'lö), n. [Eskimo.] 1. Among the Eskimos, a dome-shaped hut, usually built of shaped blocks of hard snow, with a window made of ice or intestines. In huts used as winter residences the entrance is protected by means of a smaller hut, sometimes called a storm-igloo.

> An igloo is usually built of snow. The word, however, means house, and as their [Eskimos'] houses consist of a single room, it also means room. Sometimes, at points that are regularly occupied during the winter months, igloos are built of stones, and moss piled up around and over them, so that when covered by the winter snows they make very comfortable dwellings.
> W. H. Gilder, Schwatka's Search, p. 256.

Hence—2. The excavation which a seal makes in the snow over its breathing-hole. See seal.

ignaro† (ig-nā'rō), n. [It., = Sp. Pg. ignaro, ignorant, < L. ignarus, not knowing, ignorant, < in-, not, + gnārus,* knowing, acquainted: see ignorant, ignore.] An ignorant fellow; a blockhead.

> This was the auncient keeper of that place,
> And foster father of the Gyaunt dead;
> His name Ignaro did his nature right aread.
> Spenser, F. Q., I. viii. 31.

> It was intolerable insolence in such ignaroes to challenge this for Popery, which they understood not.
> Bp. Mountagu, Appeal to Cæsar, xxxi.

Ignatian (ig-nā'shan), a. [< L. Ignatius (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, one of the apostolic fathers, martyred at Rome under Trajan about A. D. 107.—Ignatian epistles, epistles under the name of St. Ignatius, existing in three different forms or recensions: the first, extant only in a Syriac version, contains but three epistles, to Polycarp, to the Ephesians, and to the Romans; the second, or shorter Greek form (found also in Latin, Armenian, Syriac, and Coptic translations), consists of the same three epistles in a fuller text, with addition of four others, to the Smyrnæans, Magnesians, Philadelphians, and Trallians; the third, or longer Greek recension (also existing in Latin), presents in a still longer form all seven epistles already named, together with six others. The second form was known in the Eastern Church from early times, and continued in circulation side by side with the third form after the latter made its appearance. In the Western Church the third form was the only one known for many centuries. The strong assertions of these epistles in favor of episcopacy caused continental Protestants in the sixteenth century to regard them with suspicion, and in the first half of the seventeenth century a vehement controversy was kept up between Episcopalians and Presbyterians, especially in England, as to their genuineness. The controversy was revived again in the present century, when the first or Syriac form of the epistles became known.

Ignatius' bean (ig-nā'shus bēn). See St. Ignatius' beans, under bean[1].

ignavus (ig-nā'vus), n. [NL., < L. ignavus (> It. Pg. ignavo), inactive, lazy, < in-, not, + gnavus, navus,* busy, diligent.] 1. The specific name of the eagle-owl, Bubo ignavus.—2. [cap.] A genus of mammals. Klein.

igneo-aqueous (ig"nē-ō-ā'kwē-us), a. [< L. igneus, of fire, + aqua, water: see aqueous.] In geol., formed by the joint action of fire and water: thus, ashes thrown from a volcano into water and there deposited in a stratified form might properly be said to be of igneo-aqueous origin.

igneous (ig'nē-us), a. [= F. igné = Sp. igneo = Pg. It. igneo, < L. igneus, of fire, fiery, burning, < ignis, fire, = Skt. agni, fire.] 1. Pertaining to, consisting of, having the nature of, or resembling fire: as, igneous particles; igneous appearances.—2. Produced through the agency of heat, or as the result of volcanic and eruptive forces: used in geology in contradistinction to aqueous. A rock has an igneous origin when it has been discharged from a volcano; it has an aqueous origin when deposited from water. All aqueous rocks are made up of the debris of igneous ones, with the exception of such as are the result of organic agencies—that is, such as have been formed through the agency of plants or animals. Some rocks, however, are at the same time of both aqueous and igneous origin, as when volcanic ashes are thrown into water, and deposited in a stratified form.—Igneous fusion. See fusion.

ignescent (ig-nes'ent), a. and n. [< L. ignescen(t-)s, ppr. of ignescere, take fire, kindle, burn, < ignis, fire: see igneous.] I. a. Taking or giving out fire; emitting sparks of fire when struck, as with steel; scintillating: as, ignescent stones. [Rare.]

II. n. Anything that emits sparks; specifically, a stone or mineral that gives out sparks when struck with steel or iron. [Rare.]

> Many other stones, besides this class of ignescents, produce a real scintillation when struck against steel.
> Fourcroy (trans.).

ignes fatui. Plural of ignis fatuus.

ignicolist (ig-nik'ō-list), n. [< L. ignis, fire, + colere, worship, + E. -ist.] A worshiper of fire. [Rare.]

> In whatever region of the Earth this infatuated race of Ignicolists took up their abode, the sacred fire immediately began to burn. Maurice, Ruins of Babylon, ii. 26.

ignify† (ig'ni-fī), v. t. [< L. ignis, fire, + -ficare, < facere, make: see -fy.] To make into fire.

The ignified part of matter was formed into the body of the sun. Stukeley, Palæographia Sacra, p. 20.

ignigenous (ig-nij'e-nus), a. [< L. ignigenus, fire-producing, < ignis, fire, + -genus, producing: see -genous.] Engendered in or by fire. Bailey, 1731.

ignipotent (ig-nip'ō-tent), a. [= Sp. Pg. ignipotente (cf. It. ignipossente), < L. ignipoten(t-)s, an epithet of Vulcan, < ignis, fire, + poten(t-)s, mighty: see potent.] Presiding over fire; having the force or effect of fire.

Vulcan is called the power ignipotent.
Pope, tr. of Homer.

It drives, ignipotent, through every vein,
Hangs on the heart, and burns around the brain.
Savage, On the Recovery of a Lady.

ignipuncture (ig-ni-pungk'tūr), n. [< L. ignis, fire, + punctura, puncture.] In surg., puncture with a red-hot styliform cautery.

Each gland should be treated by ignipuncture.
Medical News, LIII. 216.

ignis fatuus (ig'nis fat'ū-us); pl. ignes fatui (ig'nēz fat'ū-ī). [NL., lit. 'fool's fire,' i. e. illusive fire, a term first used in the ML. or NL. period: L. ignis, fire; fatuus, foolish: see igneous and fatuous.] A feeble light that sometimes appears in summer and autumn nights, flitting in the air a little above the surface of the earth, chiefly in marshy places, near stagnant waters, or in churchyards. It is generally supposed to be produced by the spontaneous combustion of small jets of gas (carbureted or phosphureted hydrogen) generated by the decomposition of vegetable or animal matter. It has been popularly known in England by such names as will-o'-the-wisp, from its resemblance to a lighted wisp of straw, Jack-o'-lantern, corpse-candle, kit-of-the-candlestick, etc. Before the introduction of the general drainage of swamp-lands, the ignis fatuus was an ordinary phenomenon in the marshy districts of England. It is still regarded by the peasantry with superstitious awe, as of evil portent, or as the treacherous signal of evil spirits seeking to lure benighted travelers to destruction.

In a dark night, if an ignis fatuus do but precede us, the glaring of its lesser flames does so amuse our eyes that we follow it into rivers and precipices.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 2

A light which illuminates centuries must be more than an ignis fatuus. J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, iii. § 2.

ignitability (ig-nī-ta-bil'i-ti), n. [< ignitable: see -bility.] See ignitibility.

ignitable (ig-nī'ta-bl), a. [< ignite + -able.] See ignitible.

ignite (ig-nīt'), v.; pret. and pp. ignited, ppr. igniting. [< L. ignitus, pp. of ignire, set on fire, make red-hot, < ignis, fire: see igneous.] I. trans. 1. To kindle or set on fire; cause to burn: as, to ignite a match.—2. To make incandescent; cause to glow or scintillate with heat: as, to ignite iron; in chem., to heat intensely; roast.

A mode of forming nails, and the shafts of screws, by pinching or pressing ignited rods of iron between indented rollers. Ure, Dict., III. 384.

II. intrans. To take fire; begin to burn.

A fuzee fell upon the hot sand and ignited.
R. Richardson, Travels in Sahara.

★ igniter (ig-nī'tėr), n. [< ignite + -er[1].] One who or that which ignites; specifically, a signal-holder having a piston in the end for igniting a blue-light by compression.

An infernal machine is a device containing an explosive or highly combustible substance, and provided with a time exploder or igniter. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 187.

ignitibility (ig-nī-ti-bil'i-ti), n. [Also ignitability; < ignitible: see -bility.] The quality of being ignitible: as, the ignitibility of timber.

ignitible (ig-nī'ti-bl), a. [Also ignitable; < ignite + -ible.] Capable of being ignited.

Now such bodies as strike fire have sulphureous or ignitible parts within them, and those strike best which abound most in them. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

★ ignition (ig-nish'on), n. [< F. ignition = Sp. ignición = Pg. ignição = It. ignizione, < L. as if ignitio(n-)*, < ignire, set on fire: see ignite.] 1. The act of igniting, kindling, or setting on fire. Bailey.—2. Means of igniting; provision for firing. [Rare.]

This arm [the breech-loading percussion-gun] is one of the first in which cartridges containing their own ignition were used. W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 101.

3. The state of being ignited; a burning.

Cardinal Wolsey . . . is represented in his fury to have condemned the volume to a public ignition.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 284.

4. In chem., the process of roasting or intensely heating a substance.

ignivomous† (ig-niv'ō-mus), a. [= F. ignivome = Sp. ignívomo = Pg. It. ignivomo, < LL. ignivomus, vomiting fire, < L. ignis, fire, + vomere, vomit.] Vomiting fire.

Volcanos and ignivomous mountains . . . are some of the most terrible shocks of the globe.
Derham, Physico-Theology, iii. 3.

★ ignobility (ig-nō-bil'i-ti), n. [= ME. ignobylite, < OF. ignobilite, F. ignobilité = Sp. ignobilidad = Pg. ignobilidade = It. ignobilità, ignobiltà, < L. ignobilita(t-)s, want of fame, obscurity, low origin, < ignobilis, unknown to fame: see ignoble.] The quality of being ignoble, in any sense; low birth or condition; humble station; ignobleness; meanness.

His ignobylite or vnworthines was torned in to sublymite and heyth. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 161.

Pope Sixtus the fifth, who was a very poor man's son, . . . would sport with his ignobility.
Bacon, Apophthegms.

Its [self-devotion's] object, whether described simply as the service of the suffering and ignoble, or as the service of God manifested in suffering and ignobility, is one which the philosophic Greek would scarcely have recognized as a form of the καλόν.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 259.

The sense of the ignobility of Egoism adds force to that recoil from it which this perception of the conflict with duty naturally causes.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 178.

ignoble (ig-nō'bl), a. [< F. ignoble = Sp. ignoble, innoble = Pg. ignobil = It. ignobile, < L. ignobilis, unknown, unknown to fame, obscure, low-born, < in- priv. + gnobilis*, nobilis, known, illustrious, noble: see in-[3] and noble.] 1. Not noble; not illustrious; of low birth or station.

You must all confess
That I was not ignoble of descent.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

2. Not honorable or worthy; mean in character or quality; of no consideration or value.

This Clermont is a mean and ignoble place, having no memorable thing therein. Coryat, Crudities, I. 23.

Go! if your ancient but ignoble blood
Has crept through scoundrels ever since the flood.
Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 211.

The grand old name of gentleman,
Defamed by every charlatan,
And soil'd with all ignoble use.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxi.

The ignoble noble, the unmanly man,
The beast below the beast in brutishness.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 138.

3. In some technical uses, lacking distinction; of low grade; of little esteem. Specifically applied—(a) In falconry, to those short-winged hawks, as species of Astur or Accipiter, which chase or rake after the quarry: in distinction from the noble or long-winged falcons, which stoop to the quarry at a single swoop. See hawk[1]. (b) In ornith., also to those birds of prey, as buzzards, harriers, or eagles, which are not used in falconry. =Syn. 1. Plebeian, vulgar.—2. Dishonorable, degraded, contemptible, low-lived.

ignoble† (ig-nō'bl), v. t. [< ignoble, a.] To make ignoble or vile; degrade; disgrace; bring into disrepute.

Making a perambulation or pilgrimage about the northern seas, and ignobling manie shores and points of land by shipwreck. Bacon, Discourse in Prayse of Queen Elizabeth.

ignobleness (ig-nō'bl-nes), n. The condition or quality of being ignoble or humble; unworthiness; meanness.

The low stoopings and descents of the holy Jesus to the nature of a man, . . . to the ignobleness of a servant.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 67.

Among those which I hope to be able to explain when I have thought of them more are the laws which relate to nobleness and ignobleness; that ignobleness especially which we commonly call "vulgarity."
Ruskin, Elements of Drawing, iii. 9.

ignobly (ig-nō'bli), adv. In an ignoble manner; unworthily; dishonorably; meanly; basely: as, ignobly born; the troops fled ignobly.

York, then, which had the regency in France,
They force the king ignobly to displace.
Drayton, Miseries of Queen Margaret.

ignominious (ig-nō-min'i-us), a. [= F. ignominieux = Sp. Pg. It. ignominioso, < L. ignominiosus, disgraceful, shameful, < ignominia, disgrace: see ignominy.] 1. Marked with ignominy; incurring or attended with disgrace; degrading; shameful; infamous: as, ignominious punishment; ignominious intrigues.

This fellow here, with envious carping tongue,
Upbraided me about the rose I wear; . . .
With other vile and ignominious terms.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

Thus doth soft pleasure but abuse the minde,
And, making one to servile thoughts descend,
Doth make the body weake, the judgement blinde,
An hateful life, an ignominious end.
Stirling, To Prince Henry, Son of James I.

The blundering weapon recoiled and gave the valiant Kip an ignominious kick, which laid him prostrate with uplifted heels in the bottom of the boat.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 113.

2. Deserving ignominy; despicable in character; contemptible.

One single, . . . obscure, ignominious projector. Swift.

=Syn. Disgraceful, opprobrious, disreputable. See ignominy.

ignominiously (ig-nō-min'i-us-li), adv. In an ignominious manner; so as to impart or incur disgrace; degradingly; basely.

ignominy (ig'nō-min-i), n. [Formerly also contr. ignomy, q. v.; < F. ignominie = Sp. Pg. It. ignominia, < L. ignominia, disgrace, dishonor, ignominy, < in- priv. + gnomen*, nomen (-in-), name, fame, renown: see nomen, nominal.] 1. Infliction of disgrace or dishonor; the state of being degraded or held in contempt; infamy.

Their generals have been received with honour after their defeat; yours with ignominy after conquest.
Addison.

What was before me—the magic vista of romance, or the bitter ignominy of a snub? Scribner's Mag., IV. 662.

2. That which brings disgrace or shameful reproach; a cause or source of dishonor.

Death, which Sir Thomas Brown has called the very disgrace and ignominy of our natures.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, vi.

=Syn. 1. Obloquy, Opprobrium, Infamy, Ignominy. These words all started from the idea of one's being talked about shamefully, so that one's name or fame is in great dishonor. Obloquy still stays at that point; opprobrium has taken up somewhat of the general idea of being held in contempt, whether the contempt is expressed or not; infamy carries the evil repute to an extreme, abhorrence and loathing being now a part of the idea; ignominy expresses that peculiarly passive state of being in disgrace by which one is despised and neglected, or it may express the result of official treatment, judicial action, or personal conduct. Ignominy may be supposed to be the state most humbling and painful to the person concerned.

ignomious†, a. A contraction of ignominious, like ignomy for ignominy.

As lately lifting up the leaves of worthy writers' works, . . .
Wherein, as well as famous facts, ignomious placed are,
Wherein the just reward of both is manifestly shown.
Peele, Sir Clyomon, Prol.

ignomyt, n. An obsolete contracted form of ignominy.

The one of which doth bring eternall fame,
The other ignomie and dastard shame.
Mir. for Mags, p. 765.

ignoramus (ig-nō-rā'mus). [L., lit. we take no notice of (it), first pers. pl. pres. ind. of ignorare, be ignorant of, take no notice of, ignore: see ignore.] 1. In law, an indorsement, meaning 'we ignore it,' which a grand jury formerly made on a bill presented to it for inquiry, when there was not evidence to support the charges, by virtue of which indorsement all proceedings were stopped, and the accused person was discharged. It is now superseded in some States by the phrase "not a true bill," or "not found"; but the jury is still said to ignore the bill or the indictment. The indorsement "ignoramus" on a bill returned by a grand jury properly implied no more than that the jury deemed it inexpedient to pursue the matter; but it was often taken as an indication of ignorance or stupidity on the part of the jury, thus leading to the present familiar use as an English noun. Also used attributively.

And I haue seene the best, yea, naturall Italians, not onely stagger, but euen sticke faste in the myre, and at last giue it ouer, or giue their verdict with an Ignoramus.
Florio, It. Dict., Ep. Ded., p. 5.

Let ignoramus juries find no traitors:
And ignoramus poets scribble satires.
Dryden, Prol. to the Duke of Guise.

2. n. An ignorant person; especially, one who lacks necessary knowledge; an ignorant pretender to knowledge.

O Ignoramus in the Law! Can you bring an Action of Theft for Trover or Conversion, or for one that having borrow'd a Thing forswears it, that puts a Trick upon one, by some such Artifice?
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 274.

If ever you find an ignoramus in place and power, . . . I dare undertake that, as fulsome a dose as you give him, he shall readily take it down, and admit the commendation, though he cannot believe the thing!
South, Sermons, II. 335.

★ ignorance (ig'nō-rans), n. [< ME. ignorance, < OF. ignorance, F. ignorance = Pr. ignorantia, ignoransa = Sp. Pg. ignorancia = It. ignoranza, < L. ignorantia, want of knowledge or information, < ignoran(t-)s, not knowing: see ignorant.] The state of being ignorant; want of knowledge in general, or concerning some particular matter; the condition of not being cognizant, informed, or aware.

And how much are we bound to God, that he hath delivered us from these gross ignorances!
Latimer, Misc. Selections.

O, answer me;
Let me not burst in ignorance!
Shak., Hamlet, i. 4.

Preach, my dear sir, a crusade against ignorance; establish and improve the law for educating the common people. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 45.

Acquired knowledge asserts itself, and will not let us see as we saw in the day of our ignorance. George Eliot, Middlemarch, II. 400.

Ignorance (more properly, ignoration) of the elench. See ignoration.

ignorancy†, n. Same as ignorance.

So sore haue our false prophets brought ye people out of their wittes, & haue wrapped them in darcknes, and haue rocked them in blyndnes and ignorauncy. Tyndale, Works, p. 157.

ignorant (ig′nō-rant), a. and n. [< ME. ignorant, < OF. ignorant, F. ignorant = Pr. ignorans = Sp. Pg. It. ignorante, < L. ignoran(t-)s, ppr. of ignorare, have no knowledge of, be ignorant: see ignore.] I. a. 1. Destitute of knowledge in general, or concerning some particular matter; uninstructed or uninformed; untaught; unenlightened.

I am ashamed to be ignorant in what sea that island standeth whereof I write so long a treatise. Sir T. More, Utopia, Ded. to Peter Giles, p. 9.

They be ignorant of poesie that call such long tales by the name of Epitaphes; they might better call them Elegies. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 46.

Fools, alike ignorant of man and God! Browning, Ring and Book, I. 319.

The Dutch governor was at this time (1781) absolutely ignorant of the existence of a war between England and Holland. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

2. Keeping one in ignorance. [Rare.]

I beseech you,
If you know aught which does behove my knowledge Thereof to be inform'd, imprison it not In ignorant concealment. Shak., W. T., i. 2.

3†. Unconscious; unaware.

Ignorant of guilt, I fear not shame. Dryden.

4†. Done unconsciously or innocently; unknown to one's self as being of the kind mentioned.

Alas! what ignorant sin have I committed? Shak., Othello, iv. 2.

5. Showing want of knowledge; arising from or caused by ignorance: as, an ignorant proceeding; ignorant remarks.

Whose ignorant credulity will not Come up to the truth. Shak., W. T., ii. 1.

=Syn. 1. Ignorant, Illiterate, Unlettered, Unlearned, uneducated. Ignorant is the most general of these words (as, he is an ignorant fellow), except where it is limited to some subject or point (as, ignorant of the ways of the world). Illiterate means not having read or studied, or, specifically, not able to read. The illiterate are presumably ignorant outside of their own work, but not necessarily so; the ignorant are necessarily illiterate. In modern times it is as reprehensible to be illiterate as to be ignorant. Unlettered is used sometimes for illiterate and sometimes for unlearned, with corresponding measures of blame. Unlearned—that is, not learned—is, like ignorant, either general or special: as, to be unlearned in theology; as learning is the privilege of few, it is not especially blameworthy to be even generally unlearned.

Man, proud man!
Dress'd in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd. Shak., M. for M., ii. 2.

The illiterate warriors of the Middle Ages revived Totems in the form of armorial bearings. Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 203.

That unlettered, small-knowing soul. Shak., L. L. L., i. 1.

When they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled. Acts iv. 13.

This doctrine may have appeared to the unlearned light and whimsical. Addison.

II.† n. A person who is untaught or uninformed; one who is unlettered or unskilled; an ignoramus.

You are a herd of hypocritical proud ignorants. B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, v. 2.

I that was ere while the ignorant, the loyterer, on the sudden by his permission am now granted to know something. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

Ignorantine (ig-nō-ran′tin), n. [< F. ignorantin, < NL. Ignorantinus, < L. ignoran(t-)s, ignorant.] 1. A name of the Brethren of Saint-Jean-de-Dieu, an order founded in 1495.—2. See Brethren of the Christian Schools.

ignorantism (ig′nō-ran-tizm), n. [= F. ignorantisme = Sp. ignorantismo; < ignorant + -ism.] Same as obscurantism.

ignorantist (ig′nō-ran-tist), n. [= F. ignorantiste = Sp. ignorantista; < ignorant + -ist.] Same as obscurant.

ignorantly (ig′nō-rant-li), adv. In an ignorant manner; without knowledge, instruction, or information: opposed to designedly.

Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I ★unto you. Acts xvii. 23.

ignoration (ig-nō-rā′shon), n. [= Sp. ignoración, < L. ignoratio(n-), ignorance, < ignorare, not to know: see ignore.] A want of precise discrimination of an object from others; the refraining from precisely specifying what a proposed object of imagination shall be.—Ignoration of coördinates. (a) A method in analytical geometry in which a single letter represents that quantity which being equated to zero gives the equation to any given line, circle, or other locus. (b) The dynamical theory of generalized coördinates.—Ignoration of the elench (ignoratio elenchi), in logic, a fallacy which consists in refuting not the position of the antagonist, but another more or less similar position. Thus, if one party maintains that it is dangerous to base the definition of a word upon its derivation, and the other party replies by showing that derivations frequently throw great light upon the meanings of words, this reply is an ignoration of the elench.

ignore (ig-nōr′), v. t.; pret. and pp. ignored, ppr. ignoring. [= D. ignoreren = G. ignoriren = Dan. ignorere = Sw. ignorera, < F. ignorer = Pr. Sp. Pg. ignorar = It. ignorare, < L. ignōrare, have no knowledge of, mistake, take no notice of, ignore, < ignārus, not knowing, < in- priv. + gnārus, knowing (Gr. γνωρίζειν, make known), < gno-scere, no-scere,* = Gr. γιγνώσκειν = E. know: see know.] 1. Not to know; be ignorant of.

Brute and irrational barbarians, who may be supposed rather to ignore the being of God than deny it. Boyle, Works, II. 56.

2. To pass over or by without notice; treat as if not known; shut the eyes to; leave out of account; disregard: as, to ignore facts.

Ignoring Italy under our feet,
And seeing things before, behind. Mrs. Browning, First News from Villafranca.

The moral law, ignoring all vicious conditions, defects, and incapacities, prescribes the conduct of an ideal humanity. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 70.

3. In law, to throw out as being unsupported by evidence. See ignoramus, 1.

ignorement (ig-nōr′ment), n. [< ignore + -ment.] The act of ignoring, or the state of being ignored. Imp. Dict.

ignoscible† (ig-nos′i-bl), a. [< LL. ignoscibilis, pardonable, < L. ignoscere, pardon, forgive, excuse, < in- priv. + gnoscere, noscere,* know; cf. ignore.] Pardonable. E. Phillips, 1706.

ignote† (ig-nōt′), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. It. ignoto, < L. ignotus, unknown, < in- priv. + gnotus, notus,* known, pp. of gnoscere, noscere,* = E. know.] I. a. Unknown; obscure.

Shall such very ignote and contemptible pretenders be allowed a place among the most renowned of poetick writers? E. Phillips, Theatrum Poeticum, Pref. (1675).

II. n. An unknown person.

Their judgement was, the girts of peace were slack, but not broken. This is couched in the admonitions of an ignote unto King James. Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, i. 169.

iguana (i-gwä′nä), n. [NL., E., etc., E. also guana, formerly guano, < Sp. iguana, from the native Carib name, given variously as igoana, huana, yuana.] 1. A large lizard of the warmer parts of America, of the genus Iguana; also, some similar lizard of a related genus. The best-known species is the tuberculated iguana, I. tuberculata, of the West Indies and South America. It attains a length of 5 feet or more, and presents a rather formidable appearance, but is inoffensive unless molested; it feeds upon vegetables, and its flesh is much used for food. The tail is very long, compressed, and tapering; a row of scales along the back is developed into a serrate crest or dorsal ridge; the head is covered with scaly plates; and the throat has a large dewlap. The iguana is of arboreal habits, spending much of the time in trees and bushes, basking in the sun. It is easily approached, and is often captured by means of a noose attached to a stick. Its coloration is variegated with brownish, greenish, and yellowish tints.

Tuberculated Iguana (Iguana tuberculata).

2. [cap.] The typical and leading genus of the family Iguanidæ. It was formerly of great extent, but is now restricted to I. tuberculata (see above), and species closely related to it, such as the naked-necked iguana of South America, I. delicatissima, and the horned iguana of San Domingo, I. cornuta.

iguanian (i-gwä′ni-an), a. and n. I. a. Resembling or related to an iguana; belonging or relating to the Iguanidæ.

The Iguanian lizards are lower than the Acrodont. E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 113.

II. n. An iguana, or some similar lizard. Also iguanoid.

iguanid (i-gwan′id), n. A lizard of the family Iguanidæ.

Iguanidæ (i-gwan′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Iguana + -idæ.] A family of lizards of the superfamily Agamoidea and order Lacertilia, typified by the genus Iguana. The family was formerly of larger extent than now, including acrodont forms now referred to Agamidæ. Its distinctive character is the pleurodont dentition. The species are characteristically American, and chiefly inhabit the warmer parts of America; but two genera occur in Madagascar, and one in the Fiji Islands. The typical forms have a compressed body, and are adapted to an arboreal life; others, like the so-called horned toads, have a flattened form and are of terrestrial habits; a few are aquatic. Some attain a length of 5 or 6 feet. A prominent feature of many of these lizards is the development of dermal appendages in the form of spines and crest along the back and elsewhere. The flesh of some is an important article of food. Leading genera of this family, besides Iguana, are Polychrus, Cyclura, Basiliscus, Phrynosoma, Sceloporus, Crotaphytus, Holbrookia, etc. By some Anolis is also referred to the family, while by others it is considered typical of a peculiar family Anolidæ or Anolididæ. The species found in the United States are all comparatively small and inoffensive lizards, such as the common fence-lizard, the so-called chameleon, the horned toads, etc. See cuts under Basiliscus, Cyclura, and iguana.

iguaniform (i-gwan′i-fôrm), a. [< iguana + L. forma, form.] Resembling an iguana; iguanian.

Iguanodon (i-gwan′ō-don), n. [NL., < iguana + Gr. ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. The typical genus of the fossil family Iguanodontidæ: so called from the resemblance of the teeth to those of Iguana. The species, of which several are described, were of gigantic size, some being 30 feet long. They stood up on their hind limbs, which were long and strong in comparison with the fore limbs; the latter were used for prehension rather than for locomotion. The tail was long and heavy, serving to steady the animal in the erect posture and for swimming. The best-preserved specimen, an almost perfect skeleton, is that of I. bernissartensis, found in Belgium, which, as mounted, stands 14 feet high and covers a horizontal line 28 feet long.

2. [l. c.] A species or a specimen of the genus Iguanodon or family Iguanodontidæ. The name is also loosely used for many related reptiles, being thus almost synonymous with dinosaur or dinosaurian.

iguanodont (i-gwan′ō-dont), a. and n. [< iguanodon(t-).] I. a. Having teeth like those of the iguana: specifically applied to the Iguanodontidæ.

II. n. An animal of the family Iguanodontidæ.

Iguanodontidæ (i-gwan-ō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Iguanodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of gigantic extinct dinosaurs, typified by the genus Iguanodon, belonging to the order Dinosauria (or Ornithoscelida), possessing clavicles and an incomplete post-pubis. These enormous saurians present a bird-like type of structure, especially in the hind limbs. The pelvic bones are strikingly like those of birds, especially in the length and slenderness of the ischium and pubis, and the obturator process of the former bone. The hind limbs are enlarged in comparison with the fore limbs; the anterior vertebræ are slightly amphicœlous, the posterior flat; the premaxillæ are beak-like and toothless; and the mandibular symphysis is notched to receive the beak, as in some birds. The teeth are large and broad, transversely ridged, implanted in sockets and not ankylosed to the jaw, and worn down by mutual attrition. There does not appear to have been any dermal armor. Several genera besides Iguanodon have been referred to this family, as Hypsilophodon, Scelidosaurus, and others; its limits vary with different writers.

iguanoid (i-gwan′oid), a. and n. Same as iguanian.

Iguvine (ig′ū-vin), n. Same as Eugubine.

ihleite (ē′lē-īt), n. [After one Ihle, superintendent of mines at Mugrau, Bohemia.] A hydrous iron sulphate forming an orange-yellow efflorescence on graphite at Mugrau, Bohemia, derived from the alteration of pyrites.

ihram (i-räm′), n. [Ar., < harama, forbid: see haram, harem.] 1. The dress assumed by Mohammedan pilgrims. It consists of two white cotton cloths, each 6 feet long by 3½ feet wide, one of which is girded around the waist, and the other thrown over the left shoulder and knotted at the right side.

> The wife and daughters of a Turkish pilgrim of our party assumed the ihram at the same time as ourselves.
> R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 358.

2. The state in which a pilgrim is held to be from the time he assumes this distinctive garb until he lays it aside. When in this state, the pilgrim is prohibited from hunting or slaying animals (except vermin, etc.), the use of perfumes, anointing or shaving the head, cutting the beard, paring the nails, covering the face, kissing women, etc. Hughes, Dict. of Islam.

I. H. S. [In ME., ML., etc., written IHS, Ihs, repr. Gr. ΙΗΣ, a contraction, as the mark indicates, of the full form ΙΗΣΟΥΣ, L. IESUS, Jesus: see Jesus. The Latin contraction, in its ML. form, came to be regarded as an abbr. for Iesus Hominum Salvator, Jesus, Saviour of men, or for In Hoc Signo (vinces), by this sign (conquer) (the motto inscribed with the cross on the banner of Constantine), or for In Hac (cruce) Salus, in this (cross) is salvation.] An abbreviation or symbol originally representing the name of Jesus (see etymology), much used, often in monogram, as a symbol or ornament on church walls or windows, altars, altar-cloths, prayer-books, tombstones, etc.

I-iron (ī′ī″ėrn), n. An iron beam, rod, or the like, in section like a capital I. Compare angle-iron and T-iron.

ik†, pron. A Middle English form of I[2].

ik†, a. A Middle English form of ilk[2].

ik†, adv. and conj. A Middle English form of eke.

ikon, n. See icon, 2.

il-[1]. An unusual and un-English assimilation of in-[1] before l, after the analogy of or by confusion with il-[2], il-[3]: perhaps only in the rare and obsolete illighten for inlighten, enlighten (compare alighten[1]).

il-[2]. An assimilation (in Latin, etc.) of in-[2] before l. (See in-[2].) In the following words, in the etymology, the prefix il-[2] is usually referred directly to the original in-[2].

il-[3]. An assimilation (in Latin, etc.) of the negative or privative prefix in-[3] before l. (See in-[3].) In the following words, in the etymology, the prefix il-[3] is usually referred directly to the original in-[3].

-il, -ile. [ME. -il, -ile, -yl, -yle, F. -il, -ile, fem. -ile, Pr. -il, -ile = Sp. Pg. -il = It. -ile, < (1) L. -ilis, forming adjectives from verbs, being attached to the inf. stem, as in agilis, agile, facilis, facile, fragilis, fragile, habilis, manageable, habile, etc., or to the pp. stem in -t- or -s-, as in fertilis, fertile, fossilis, fossil, missilis, missile, textilis, textile, volatilis, volatile, etc. (and similarly to nouns, as fluviatilis, fluviatile, aquatilis, aquatile, etc.), or to noun-stems, as gracilis, slender, humilis, humble, etc.; (2) L. -ilis, forming adjectives, and nouns thence derived, from nouns, as civilis, civil, hostilis, hostile, juvenilis, juvenile, servilis, servile, etc. See the corresponding E. words. In older words this suffix often appears as -le (syllabic l), as in gentle, able, humble, etc., esp. in the compound form -ble, < L. -bi-lis: see -le, -ble. The suffix is prop. -l, L. -lis, the preceding vowel belonging to the stem or being supplied. Cf. -al, -el[2], -ule.] A suffix of Latin origin, forming in Latin adjectives and nouns derived from them, and less frequently nouns directly from verbs and nouns, many of which formations have come into English. The proper English spelling when the vowel is short is -il, as in civil, fossil, etc., and formerly fertil, fragil, hostil, etc.; but in most cases -ile now prevails, as in fertile, fragile, hostile, missile, textile, volatile, juvenile, servile, etc. When the vowel is pronounced long, -ile exclusively is used, as in gentile and other nouns, and, in an unapproved pronunciation, hostile, juvenile, etc. The same original suffix appears as -le in gentle, able, humble, etc., and is still further disguised in genteel and jaunty.

iland†, n. The former and more correct spelling of island[1].

ilce[1]†, ilche[1]†, a. Middle English forms of ilk[1].

ilce[2]†, ilche[2]†, a. Middle English forms of each.

ild† (ild), v. An obsolete dialectal form of yield. It occurs in the phrase God ild, for God yield. See under God[1].

ilde†, n. A Middle English variant of isle[1].

ile[1]†, n. The former and more correct spelling of isle[1]. Chaucer.

ile[2]†, n. The former and more correct spelling of aisle.

ile[3]† (īl), n. A form of ail[2].

ile[4] (īl), n. A dialectal form of oil.

ile[5]†, n. [ME., < AS. il, igel, a hedgehog. See echinus.] A hedgehog.

ile[6] (īl), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps a particular use of ile[5].] A small flat trematoid worm found in the livers of sheep.

ile[7]† (īl), n. Same as ileum.

> Next to the bag of the stomacke, men and sheep have the small guts called lactes, through which the meat passeth; in others it is named ile. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xi. 37.

ile[8]†. A former spelling of I'll, a colloquial contraction of I will.

-ile. See -il.

ileac (il′ē-ak), a. [< ileum + -ac.] Pertaining to the ileum or lower bowels.—Ileac passion. Same as ileus, 1. See iliac.

ileitis (il-ē-ī′tis), n. [NL., < ileum + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the ileum.

ileocæcal (il″ē-ō-sē′kal), a. [< ileum + cæcum + -al.] Of or pertaining to both the ileum and the cæcum.—Ileocæcal valve, the valvula Bauhini, the valve guarding the opening of the ileum at the cæcum. See the extract. Also called ileocolic valve.

> The opening of the small intestine into the large is provided with prominent lips, which project into the cavity of the latter, and oppose the passage of matters from it into the small intestine, while they readily allow of a passage the other way. This is the ileocæcal valve.
> Huxley and Youmans, [Physiol., § 188.

a, ileum, terminating in the cæcum, the latter continuing in e, the colon; d, the ileocæcal valve; b, the vermiform appendage, opening at c in the cæcum.

ileocolic (il″ē-ō-kol′-ik), a. [< NL. ileocolicus, < ileum + colon[2]: see colic.] Of or pertaining to the ileum and the colon.—Ileocolic artery. See ileocolica.—Ileocolic valve. Same as ileocæcal valve.

ileocolica (il″ē-ō-kol′i-kạ), n.; pl. ileocolicæ (-sē). [NL., fem. of ileocolicus: see ileocolic.] The ileocolic artery, one of the larger branches of the superior mesenteric artery, supplying parts of the ileum and colon.

ileocolitis (il″ē-ō-kō-lī′tis), n. [NL., < ileum + colon[2] + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the ileum and colon.

Ileodictyon (il″ē-ō-dik′ti-on), n. [NL., < L. ileum, ilium, ileum, + Gr. δίκτυον, a net.] A genus of gasteromycetous fungi generally united with Clathrus. They have gelatinous volva, and receptacle with hollow branches. I. cibarium is eaten by the New-Zealanders, and is called thunder-dirt.

ileoparietal (il″ē-ō-pạ-rī′e-tạl), a. [< NL. ileum, ileum, + L. paries (pariet-), wall: see parietal.] Pertaining to the ileum and to the wall of the body-cavity.—Ileoparietal band, in Brachiopoda, a kind of mesentery which passes from the hind-gut to the parietes of the cœlomatic cavity.

ileostomy (il-ē-os′tō-mi), n. [< NL. ileum, ileum, + Gr. στόμα, mouth.] In surg., the formation of an artificial opening into the ileum, as between the jejunum and the ileum.

> Jejuno-ileostomy and ileo-ileostomy were performed in identically the same way. The Lancet, No. 3420, p. 531.

ileotyphus (il″ē-ō-tī′fus), n. [NL., < ileum + typhus.] Typhoid or enteric fever.

ilesite (īlz′īt), n. [After M. W. Iles, an American metallurgist (born 1852).] A hydrous sulphate of manganese, zinc, and iron, found in friable crystalline aggregates in Park county, Colorado.

ileum (il′ē-um), n. [NL. application of L. ileum, ilium (see ilium), or ile, usually in pl. ilia, that part of the abdomen which extends from the lowest ribs to the pubes, the groin, flank; prob., like ileus, ult. < Gr. εἰλεῖν, roll, wind, turn: see ileus. Hence (from L. ilia) ult. E. jade[2], q.v.] 1. In anat., the lower one of three parts into which the small intestine is divisible, continuous with the jejunum and ending in the large intestine: more fully called intestinum ileum, from its many coils or convolutions. In man the ileum is taken to be the terminal three fifths of the small intestine, though its beginning is indistinguishable from the ending of the jejunum; but it ends abruptly at the cæcum, or commencement of the colon. The ileum has on an average a smaller diameter than the preceding part of the intestine, and its coats are thinner and less vascular. It lies chiefly in the umbilical, hypogastric, and right iliac regions of the abdomen. In many animals, especially those which lack a cæcum or cæca, no ileum is certainly distinguishable either from preceding or succeeding portions of the intestine; but whenever the beginning of a colon can be determined, a preceding portion of the intestinal tract, of however indefinite extent, is regarded as an ileum. See cuts under ileocæcal and intestine.

2. Hence, in general, the lower part, of indeterminate extent, of the small intestine; or, when there is no distinction between large and small intestine, a part of the intestine preceding the cæcum or the cæca.—3. In entom., a narrow part of the intestine of an insect, generally adjoining the ventriculus or stomach, and divided from the broader colon or second intestine by a constriction or valve. The ileum may be long and convoluted or straight and short; in the Hemiptera and some Neuroptera it is entirely wanting.

ileus (il′ē-us), n. [NL., < L. ileos, < Gr. εἰλεός, or ἴλιός, a grievous disease of the intestines, a severe kind of colic, < εἰλεῖν, εἴλειν, εἰλλειν, roll up, wind, turn, in pass. also shrink up, √*ϝελ = L. volvere = E. wallow: see volute and wallow. Cf. ileum.] 1. In pathol., severe colic, attended with stercoraceous vomiting, due to intestinal obstruction: also applied loosely to severe colic of other origin. Also called ileac or iliac passion.—2. Same as ileum.

Ilex (ī′leks), n. [L., the holm-oak.] 1. A genus of trees and shrubs, of the family Aquifoliaceæ, or holly family. It is characterized by having the flowers more or less dicecious polygamous; the calyx small, and with 4 to 6 teeth; the corolla rotate, and divided into 4, rarely 5 or 6, parts; 4 to 6 stamens; and an ovary with 4 to 6, rarely 7 or 8, cells forming a berry-like drupe. The plants of this genus have alternate, often thick, evergreen leaves, and white flowers, usually axillary. It comprehends about 160 species, many of which are natives of Central America, others occurring throughout the tropical and temperate regions of the globe, being represented least frequently in Africa and Australia. Among the most remarkable of them are: I. Aquifolium and I. opaca (see holly[1]); I. Balearica, the broad-leafed holly of Minorca, a very handsome species; and I. Paraguariensis, whose leaves are consumed in large quantities in South America, under the name of Paraguay tea or maté. (See maté[4].) I. verticillata is the Virginia winterberry or black alder. I. vomitoria is the yaupon. I. lævigata is the smooth winterberry of the eastern United States; I. Cassine, the dahoon holly of Virginia and southward. I. sideroxyloides of the West Indies is a large tree called Dominica oak. The genus is widely known in a fossil state, some 50 or 60 extinct species having been described, chiefly from the Miocene of Europe, but ranging from the Middle Cretaceous to the Quaternary. Several occur in the Green River Group (Eocene) of the Rocky Mountain region.

Winterberry (Ilex verticillata).
1, flowering branch of the male plant; 2, branch of the female plant, with fruit; a, single fruit on larger scale.

2. [l. c.] A tree or shrub of this genus.

> There oft, in goat-skin clad, a sunburnt peasant
> Like Pan comes frisking from his ilex wood.
> Locker, An Invitation to Rome.

ilia, n. Plural of ilium.

iliac[1] (il′i-ak), a. and n. [(1) Partly < L. iliacus, relating to the colic, < ileos, the colic (see ileus); (2) partly < F. iliaque = Sp. iliaco = Pg. It. iliaco, < NL. iliacus (not in L.), pertaining to the ileum, < ileum, the lower part of the small intestine, L. ileum, ilium, the ilia, the flank: see ileum.]

I. a. 1†. Pertaining to the ileum; ileac. Also iliacal.—2. Of or pertaining to the ilium or flank-bone.—Circumflex iliac artery, one of two principal branches of the external iliac, arising opposite the origin of the epigastric, and running along the inner lip of the crest of the ilium.—External iliac artery, the outer and larger branch of the common iliac, lying, in man, along the inner border of the psoas magnus muscle, and extending to Poupart's ligament, beneath which it passes and becomes the femoral artery. Its chief branches are the epigastric and circumflex iliac.—Iliac artery, one of two arteries, right and left, formed by the bifurcation of the abdominal aorta, and in turn bifurcating to form the external and internal iliac arteries on each side of the body. More fully called common iliac artery. In man the bifurcation occurs opposite the body of the fourth lumbar vertebra. Each common iliac is about two inches long, the right being a little longer and somewhat more oblique than the left; no large branches are usually given off till the artery forks into the external and the internal iliac, the latter supplying the pelvic walls and viscera, the former continuing, under the name of femoral artery, to supply the lower extremities.—Iliac crest. See crista ilii, under crista.—Iliac fascia, fossa, etc. See the nouns.—Iliac muscle. Same as iliacus, 1.—Iliac (properly ileac) passion. Same as ileus, 1.

> He [Stephen] was suddenly taken with the Iliack Passion. Baker, Chronicles, p. 51.

Iliac region. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.—Iliac symphysis, the junction of opposite ilia with each other, or the junction of an ilium with another bone.—Iliac vein, either one, right or left, of two veins corresponding to and accompanying the iliac arteries, formed by the union of the external and internal iliac veins, and uniting to form the inferior vena cava or post-caval vein. They bring blood from the pelvis and lower extremities. See cut under embryo.—Internal iliac artery, the inner, and in the adult the smaller, of the branches of the common iliac. In the fetus it is comparatively much larger, and known as the hypogastric artery. (See cut under embryo.) It dips deeply into the pelvis, from the point of bifurcation of the common iliac to the sacrosciatic notch, and divides into two main trunks, anterior and posterior, which give off numerous branches to the walls and contents of the pelvis. The principal of these are the iliolumbar, lateral sacral, and gluteal, from the posterior division, and the obturator, internal pudic, sciatic, middle hemorrhoidal, and several vesical arteries, together with uterine and vaginal arteries in the female from the anterior.—Superficial circumflex iliac artery, a small subcutaneous branch of the femoral artery, running parallel with Poupart's ligament.

II. n. An iliac artery.

Iliac[2] (il′i-ak), a. [< Gr. Ἰλιακός, Trojan, < Ἴλιον, Ilium, Troy: see Iliad.] Of or pertaining to ancient Ilium, or to the Trojan war; Ilian: as, "the Iliac cycle," Gladstone.

iliacal (i-lī′a-kal), a. [< iliac + -al.] Same as iliac[1], 1.

> It is a strange iliacal passion that so hardens a man's bowels. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 635.

iliacus (i-lī′a-kus), n.; pl. iliaci (-sī). [NL.: see iliac[1].] 1. The iliac muscle, occupying the venter of the ilium or iliac fossa, and passing over the brim of the pelvis to be inserted with the psoas magnus into the trochanter minor of the femur. See cut under muscle.—2. In ornith., the technical specific name of the redwing or red-winged thrush, Turdes iliacus: probably given from the coloration of the flanks.

Iliad (il′i-ad), n. [= F. Iliade = Sp. Ilíada = Pg. It. Iliade, < L. Ilias (Iliad-), < Gr. Ἰλιάς (Ἰλιαδ-), the Iliad, < Ἴλιον (L. Ilium, Ilion) or Ἴλιος (L. Ilius), Ilium, Troy, so called, according to tradition, from its mythical founder Ilus, Gr. Ἴλος.] One of the two great Greek epic poems of prehistoric antiquity (the other being the Odyssey), attributed to Homer. These poems are considered by some scholars to represent not the work of any one man, but an elaboration of a series of legends sung by a school of ancient Ionic rhapsodists. The subject of the Iliad is the ten years' siege of Ilium or Troy by the confederated states of Greece under Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ, to redress the injury done to Menelaus, king of Sparta, in the carrying off of his wife, Helen, by the Trojan Paris, to whom Helen was given by Aphrodite as a reward for his decision in favor of Aphrodite in the contest of beauty between her, Athena, and Hera. The direct narrative relates only to a part of the last year, leaving the fall of the city untold. The mighty deeds of the Greek Achilles and of the Trojan Hector, son of King Priam, supply some of the chief episodes of the poem. The Iliad and Odyssey were universally looked upon by the Greeks, in spite of endless variations and differences from legends received later, as an authoritative and inspired record of the early history and the religious beliefs and doctrines of their race. As epics, the first rank in poetry has always been conceded to them.

iliadize (il′i-ad-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. iliadized, ppr. iliadizing. [< Iliad + -ize.] To celebrate or relate as in the Iliad; narrate epically. [Rare.]

> Ulysses, . . . of whom it is Illiadized that your very nose dropt sugarcandie. Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 162).

Ilian (il′i-an), a. [< Ilium + -an.] Of or pertaining to ancient Ilium or Troy, or to the Greco-Roman city in the Trojan plain called New Ilium.

> Hector on Ilian coins. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 415.

Liceæ (i-lis′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Loesener, 1901), < Ilex (Ilic-) + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, of the family Aquifoliaceæ, containing the 2 genera Ilex and Nemopanthes, and about 271 species, which are distributed in North and South America and Asia, with a few in Africa and Australia. See ★Aquifoliaceæ, Ilex, and Nemopanthes.

ilichet, adv. A Middle English form of alike.

ilicin, ilicine (il′i-sin), n. [< ilex (ilic-) + -in[2], -ine[2].] The non-nitrogenous bitter principle of Ilex Aquifolium. It forms brownish-yellow crystals, is very bitter, and is said to have febrifuge qualities.

iliket, a. and adv. A Middle English form of alike.

> But theire strokes were not alle I-like, ffor Pounce smote the kynge vpon the helme that he enclyned vpon his horse crowpe. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 391.

ilio-aponeurotic (il″i-ō-ap″ō-nū-rot′ik), a. [< NL. ilium + aponeurosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to the ilium, and having the character of an aponeurosis.

iliocaudal (il″i-ō-kâ′dal), a. and n. I. a. [< NL. ilium + L. cauda, tail: see caudal.] In zoöl., of or pertaining to both the ilium and the tail: applied to certain muscles connecting the ilium with the tail.

II. n. An iliocaudal muscle.

iliocaudalis (il″i-ō-kâ-dā′lis), n.; pl. iliocaudales (-lēz). [NL.] Same as iliocaudal.

iliococcygeal (il″i-ō-kok-sij′ē-al), a. [< NL. ilium + coccyx (-yg-): see coccygeal.] Pertaining to the ilium and the coccyx; iliocaudal.

iliococcygeus (il″i-ō-kok-sij′ē-us), n.; pl. iliococcygei (-ī). [NL., < ilium + coccygeus.] A muscle of some animals connecting the ilium with the coccyx; an iliocaudal muscle.

iliocostal (il″i-ō-kos′tal), a. [< NL. ilium + L. costa, rib: see costal.] Pertaining to the ilium and to the ribs: as, the iliocostal muscle.

iliocostalis (il″i-ō-kos-tā′lis), n.; pl. iliocostales (-lēz). [NL.: see iliocostal.] A muscle of the back; a part of the outer mass of the erector ★spinæ. Also called sacrolumbalis.

iliofemoral (il″i-ō-fem′ō-ral), a. [< NL. ilium + L. femur, thigh: see femoral.] Pertaining to the haunch-bone and the thigh-bone; connecting the ilium and the femur.—Iliofemoral ligament, a special thickening of the capsular ligament of the hip-joint.

iliohypogastric (il″i-ō-hī-pō-gas′trik), a. [< NL. ilium + E. hypogastric.] Pertaining to the iliac and hypogastric abdominal regions: specifically applied to a nerve, a branch of the lumbar plexus distributed to those parts.

ilio-inguinal (il″i-ō-ing′gwi-nal), a. [< NL. ilium + L. inguen, groin: see inguinal.] Pertaining to the iliac region and to the groin: specifically applied to a nerve, a branch of the lumbar plexus distributed to those parts.

ilio-ischiac (il″i-ō-is′ki-ak), a. [< NL. ilium + ischium: see ischiac.] Pertaining to the ilium and the ischium; iliosciatic: as, the ilio-ischiac articulation or ankylosis.

ilio-ischiatic (il″i-ō-is-ki-at′ik), a. Same as ilio-ischiac.

iliolumbar (il″i-ō-lum′bär), a. [< NL. ilium + lumbus, loin: see lumbar.] Pertaining to the haunch-bone and the loins, or to the iliac and lumbar regions.—Iliolumbar ligament, a fibrous band between the last lumbar vertebra and the crest of the ilium.

ilioparietal (il″i-ō-pā-rī′e-tal), a. An incorrect form of ileoparietal. E. R. Lankester.

iliopectineal (il″i-ō-pek-ti-nē′al), a. [< NL. ilium + L. pecten (pectin-), comb.] Pertaining to that crest or comb of the ilium which forms in part the brim of the true pelvis.—Iliopectineal line, or iliopectineal eminence, a ridge on the ilium and pubis, assisting in marking the distinction between the true and the false pelvis; morphologically, one of the borders of the ilium, slightly exhibited in man, but in some animals an elongated process, even having an independent center of ossification. Also called linea iliopectinæa. See cut under innominatum.

iliopectinium (il″i-ō-pek-tin′i-um), n.; pl. iliopectinia (-ä). [NL.: see iliopectineal.] An iliopectineal part, or representation of a rudimentary pelvis, such as exists in an amphisbænid, for example.

ilioperoneal (il″i-ō-per-ō-nē′al), a. and n. [< NL. ilium + Gr. περόνη, fibula: see peroneal.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the ilium and the fibula: applied to certain muscles.

II. n. A muscle which in many animals connects the ilium with the fibula, thus repeating substantially the connections of the long head of the human biceps femoris.

iliopsoas (il-i-op′sō-as), n. [NL., < ilium + psoas.] The iliacus and psoas magnus muscles taken together, or some muscle which represents them.

> Thus the two muscles, so far as their action goes, may be considered as one, and are sometimes called the iliopsoas. Holden, Anat. (1885), p. 510.

iliopsoatic (il-i-op-sō-at′ik), a. [< iliopsoas, after psoatic.] Pertaining to the iliac bone and the psoas muscle: as, the iliopsoatic muscle; the iliopsoatic region.

iliosacral (il″i-ō-sā′kral), a. [< NL. ilium + sacrum: see sacral.] Of or pertaining to the ilium and the sacrum; sacro-iliac: as, the iliosacral arthron.

iliosciatic (il″i-ō-sī-at′ik), a. [< NL. ilium + sciaticus, sciatic.] Ilio-ischiac.

> In all ordinary birds, the ischium . . . . extends back, nearly parallel with the hinder part of the ilium, and is united with it by ossification, posteriorly. The iliosciatic interval is thus converted into a foramen. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 250.

iliotibial (il″i-ō-tib′i-al), a. [< NL. ilium + tibia: see tibial.] Pertaining to or extending between the ilium and the tibia.—Iliotibial band, the thickest part of the fascia lata of the femur, lying over the vastus externus, binding this muscle down, and giving insertion to the tensor vaginæ femoris and part of the glutæus maximus.

ilium (il′i-um), n.; pl. ilia (-ä). [NL., a special application of L. ilium, ileum, the flank: see ileum.] In anat., the anterior or superior bone of the pelvic arch, commonly ankylosed with the ischium and pubis at the acetabulum, and then forming a part of the os innominatum or haunch-bone, and effecting the principal or only articulation of the pelvic arch with the vertebral column, especially with the sacrum. The ilium is present in the great majority of vertebrates above the fishes; it is sometimes entirely free from the vertebral column. It is primitively a prismatic cartilaginous rod, which ultimately becomes, as a rule, the most expanded part of the haunch-bone, as in man. It frequently ankyloses with some of the ribs as well as with vertebræ, as in many Sauropsida. The shape and relative position of the human ilium are highly exceptional, in comparison with those of other vertebrates. See cuts under Dromæus, Ichthyosauria, innominatum, and skeleton.—Crista ilii. See crista.

Iliupersis (il″i-ū-pėr′sis), n. [G., < Gr. Ἰλίου πέρσις, the title of several poems: Ἴλιον, gen. of Ἴλιον, Ilium, Troy (see Iliad); πέρσις, destruction, sacking, < πέρθειν, waste, destroy.] In classical myth., archæol., etc., the destruction of Troy or Ilium; hence, a poem or an account treating of the destruction of Troy, or a graphic or plastic representation of the destruction of Troy, or of some episode connected with its fall.

> How far the scene of a besieged city may have been influenced by the Iliupersis of Polygnotos on the [Painted] Portico just mentioned and again in the Lesche at Delphi it is impossible to say. A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, II. 223.

ilixanthin (ī-lik-san′thin), n. [Short for ilicixanthin*, < L. ilex (ilic-), holm-oak, + Gr. ξανθός, yellow, + -in[2].] A crystalline coloring matter found in the leaves of holly. It forms a yellow dye on cloth prepared with alumina or iron mordants.

ilk[1] (ilk), a. [< ME. ilke, ulke, ilce, assibilated ilche, yche, < AS. ilc, ylc, the same, < ȳ*, instr. of a pronominal root represented by Goth. i-s, he (see he[1]), and L. i-dem, the same (see idem, identic), + -līc, connected with ge-līc, like, and appearing also similarly in each, which = Sc. whilk, such = Sc. sic, Sc. thilk, etc.] Same; very same: often used absolutely with that. Illicium (i-lis'i-um), n. [NL., so called in allusion to the perfume, < L. illicere, allure, entice, charm: see illect.] A genus of eastern Asiatic and American evergreen shrubs, belonging to the family Magnoliaceæ. The various plants of this genus are called anise-trees, from their fine aromatic scent. The seeds of I. anisatum (Chinese anise), a shrub growing 8 or 10 feet high, are stomachic and carminative, and yield a very fragrant volatile oil. The fruit is the star-anise of the shops. The Chinese burn the seeds in their temples, and Europeans employ them to aromatize certain liqueurs or cordials, such as anisette. I. religiosum is a Japanese species, about the size of a cherry-tree, held sacred by the natives, who decorate the tombs of their dead with wreaths of its flowers, and burn the fragrant bark as incense before their deities. From the property of the bark of consuming slowly and uniformly, the watchmen in Japan burn it powdered in a tube to mark the time. The American species I. Floridanum and I. parviflorum are natives of the southern United States. The former is an evergreen shrub, 6 to 10 feet high, with somewhat fleshy leaves and large flowers. The latter has smaller flowers. Fruits of this genus have been recognized in a fossil state in the London Clay (Eocene) of the Isle of Sheppey, and in the lignites of Brandon in Vermont, probably of the same age, and leaf-impressions in the Cretaceous of Bohemia.

Intrepid, with muscles of steel, and finely formed, they are very illiterate. Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 26.

2. Showing illiteracy or want of culture; rude; barbarous.

There are in many places heresy, and blasphemy, and impertinency, and illiterate rudenesses.
Jer. Taylor, Extempore Prayer.

Brown monks with long dangling hair, and faces kindly but altogether illiterate, hang about in desultory groups.
Scribner's Mag., IV. 275.

=Syn. Unlettered, Unlearned, etc. See ignorant.

II. n. An illiterate person; one unable to read or to write.

In Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, and some German states, there are hardly any illiterates.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVII. 640.

These illiterates belong almost exclusively to the colored race. N. A. Rev., CXLII. 382.

illiterately (i-lit′e-rāt-li), adv. In an illiterate manner.

To unread 'squires illiterately gay;
Among the learn'd, as learned full as they.
Savage, To John Powell.

illiterateness (i-lit′e-rāt-nes), n. The state of being illiterate; illiteracy.

What blindness pursues them, that they mark the things He made only with their museum-labels, and think they have exhausted its contribution when they have never even been within sight of it? This is not even atheism. It is simple illiterateness.
Nineteenth Century, XIX. 213.

illiterature (i-lit′e-rā-tūr), n. [< L. in- priv. + literatura, litteratura, literature.] Want of learning; unlettered condition; illiteracy; ignorance. [Rare.]

The more usual causes of this deprivation are want of holy orders, illiterature, or inability for the discharge of that sacred function, and irreligion. Ayliffe, Parergon.

The illiterature of the age approached to barbarism; the evidences of history were destroyed.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 247.

ill-judged (il′jujd′), a. Done without judgment; injudicious; unwise.

ill-laid†, a. Badly conceived or proposed; unreasonable.

'Tis such another strange ill-laid request
As if a beggar should intreat a king
To leave his sceptre and his throne to him.
Beau. and Fl., King and No King, ii. 1.

ill-lived (il′livd′), a. [< ill + life + *-ed*2.] Leading a disreputable or wicked life.

A scandalous and ill-lived teacher. Bp. Hall.

ill-looked (il′lůkt′), a. Having an ill or bad look; homely; plain. Scott.

ill-looking (il′lůk′ing), a. Having a bad look or appearance; ugly; uncomely.

ill-mannered (il′man′ėrd), a. Of bad manners; uncivil; impolite; rude; boorish.

ill-natured (il′nā′tūrd), a. 1. Having a bad nature or character.

It is impossible that any besides an ill-natured man can wish against the Being of a God.
Shaftesbury, Letter concerning Enthusiasm, § 4, quoted [in Fowler, p. 118.

Rich, foreign mould on their ill-natured land.
J. Philips, Cider, i.

2. Having a bad temper; churlish; crabbed; surly; spiteful: as, an ill-natured person.

It might be one of those ill-natured beings who are at enmity with mankind, and do therefore take pleasure in filling them with groundless terrors. Atterbury.

ill-naturedness (il′nā′tūrd-nes), n. The quality of being ill-natured; crabbedness; spitefulness.

illness (il′nes), n. [< ME. ilnesse, ylnesse; < ill + -ness.] 1†. Evilness; badness; wickedness; iniquity; moral perversion.

I haue lefte to hir the gardeins of Vulcan, whiche I caused to make for her recreation. And if thou take it from hir, thou shewest thyne ylnesse. Golden Book, xlvii.

The best examples haue neuer such forse to moue to any goodnes as the bad, vaine, light, and fond haue to all ilnes.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 68.

2†. A bad or unfavorable state or condition; unfavorableness.

He that has his chains knocked off, and the prison-doors set open, is perfectly at liberty, though his preference be determined to stay, by the illness of the weather. Locke.

3. An attack of sickness; ailment; malady; disease: as, he has recovered from his illness.

This is the first letter that I have ventured upon, which will be written, I fear, vacillantibus literis; as Tully says, Tyro's letters were after his recovery from an illness.
Atterbury.

=Syn. 3. Illness, Sickness, Ailment, complaint, disorder. Sick and sickness have been considered until within the present century essentially synonymous with ill and illness. Of late, English usage has tended to restrict sick and sickness to nausea, and American usage has followed it so far as to regard illness as a rather more elegant and less definite term: beyond that it does not seem likely to go. An ailment is generally of small account, comparatively, and local: as, his ailment was only a headache. None of these words represent ordinarily so serious an attack as disease, but illness and sickness may do so. See disease and debility.

illocable (i-lō′ka-bl), a. [= Pg. illocavel, < L. illocabilis, inlocabilis, lit. that cannot be placed, < in- priv. + locabilis, < locare, place: see locate.] In law, incapable of being placed out or hired.

illocal (i-lō′kal), a. [< ML. illocalis, without place, < in- priv. + localis, local.] Without place; not in any definite portion of space.

This is in itself very absurd, to suppose . . . finite and particular beings to be thus illocal and immoveable, nowhere and every where.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 783.

Nor is the presence of Christ in the bread and wine (illocal, uncircumscribed) based upon the fact that the body of Christ is glorified. Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 686.

illocality (il-ō-kal′i-ti), n. [< illocal + -ity.] Want of locality or place; the state of not existing in a locality or place.

An assertion of the inextension and illocality of the soul was long and very generally eschewed. Sir W. Hamilton.

ill-off (il′ôf′), a. Badly provided for; not in comfortable circumstances: opposed to well-off.

Doubtless it is true that the greater part of the money exacted comes from those who are relatively well-off. But this is no consolation to the ill-off from whom the rest is exacted. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 73.

illogical (i-loj′i-kal), a. [< *in-*3 + logical. Cf. F. illogique.] 1. Ignorant or negligent of the rules of logic or sound reasoning: as, an illogical disputant.

Even the most illogical of modern writers would stand perfectly aghast at the puerile fallacies which seem to have deluded some of the greatest men of antiquity.
Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

2. Contrary to the rules of logic or sound reasoning: as, an illogical inference.

What is there among the actions of beasts so illogical and repugnant to reason? Cowley, Shortness of Life.

This distinction of precepts and counsels is illogical and ridiculous, one member of the distinction grasping within itself the other. South, Works, VIII. vi.

=Syn. 2. Inconclusive, inconsequent, unsound, fallacious, sophistical.

illogicality (i-loj-i-kal′i-ti), n. [< illogical + -ity.] 1. Illogicalness; want of logic or sound reasoning.

It accuses the subtle Berkeley . . . of illogicality.
Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 329.

2. That which is illogical; a case of illogicalness.

Even Irish extraction would scarcely suffice to account for the illogicality. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 406.

illogically (i-loj′i-kal-i), adv. In an illogical manner.

illogicalness (i-loj′i-kal-nes), n. The quality of being illogical; opposition to sound reasoning.

There are divers texts of the Old Testament applied to Christ in the New, which, though they did not now inevitably conclude against the present Jews, were without any illogicalness employed against their ancestors.
Boyle, Works, II. 274.

ill-omened (il′ō′mend), a. Having or attended by bad omens; ill-starred.

Remembering his ill-omen'd song, [she] arose
Once more thro' all her height.
Tennyson, Princess, vi.

illoricate (i-lor′i-kāt), a. [< *in-*3 + loricate.] In zoöl., not loricate; having no lorica.

Illosporiacei (il-ō-spō-ri-ā′sē-ī), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1849), < Illosporium + -acei.] A division of gymnomycetous fungi, of which the genus Illosporium is the type. It is referred by Saccardo to the Hyphomycetes, family Tuberculariew.

Illosporium (il-ō-spō′ri-um), n. [NL. (K. F. P. von Martius, 1817), < Gr. (dial.) ἴλλος, the eye, + σπορά, a spore.] A genus of fungi placed by Saccardo in the Hyphomycetes, family Tuberculariew, having the conidia globular and agglutinated by a gelatinous substance. They occur among mosses and lichens and on the trunks of trees.

ill-part†, a. Ill-conditioned. Nares.

King John, that ill-part personage.
Death of R. Earle of Huntington (1601).

ill-set (il′set′), a. 1. Set or disposed to evil; ill-natured; spiteful. [Scotch.]

Auld luckie cries; "Ye're o'er ill-set;
As ye'd hae measure, ye sud met."
The Farmer's Ha', st. 38.

2. Having the type incorrectly set; ill-printed.

If lovers should mark everything a fault,
Affection would be like an ill-set book,
Whose faults might prove as big as half the volume.
Middleton, Changeling, ii. 1.

ill-sorted (il′sôr′ted), a. 1. Ill-assorted; ill-arranged; hence, ill-matched; ill-paired: as, an ill-sorted couple.—2. Ill-suited; ill-satisfied. [Scotch.]

Ye'll be ill-sorted to hear that he's like to be in the prison at Portanferry. Scott, Guy Mannering, xlv.

ill-starred (il′stärd′), a. [< ill + *star*1 + *-ed*2. Cf. disastrous.] Under the influence of an evil star; hence, fated to be unfortunate; ill-omened. [A word borrowed from astrology.]

Now, how dost thou look now? O ill-starr'd wench!
Shak., Othello, v. 2.

Then from thy foolish Heart, vain Maid, remove An useless Sorrow, and an ill-starr'd Love.
Prior, Henry and Emma.

ill-tempered (il′tem′pėrd), a. 1†. Distempered; disordered.

Hath Cassius liv'd
To be but mirth and laughter to his Brutus,
When grief, and blood ill-temper'd, vexeth him?
Shak., J. C., iv. 3.

Put on a half shirt first this summer, it being very hot; and yet so ill-tempered I am grown, that I am afraid I shall catch cold, while all the world is afraid to melt away.
Pepys, Diary, II. 139.

2. Having a bad temper; morose; crabbed; petulant; surly; cross.

When I spoke that I was ill-temper'd too.
Shak., J. C., iv. 3.

=Syn. 2. See ill-natured.

illth (ilth), n. [< ill + -th; formed after the analogy of wealth.] Ill-being: the opposite of wealth (well-being). [Rare.]

The squandering of a nation's labor in the production not of wealth but of illth results in the robbery of the wage-workers. Christian Union, Aug. 11, 1887.

ill-time (il′tīm′), v. t. [< ill + time, v.] To do or attempt at an unsuitable time; mistime. Wright. [Rare.]

ill-timed (il′tīmd′), p. a. Not at a suitable time; unseasonable; inopportune.

Madness, we fancy, gave an ill-tim'd Birth
To grinning Laughter, and to frantic Mirth.
Prior, Solomon, iii.

illuminati (i-lū-mi-nā'tī), n. pl. [L., pl. of illuminatus, enlightened: see illuminate, a.] 1†. Eccles., persons who had received baptism, in which ceremony a lighted taper was given to them as a symbol of spiritual enlightenment. —2. [cap.] A name given to different religious societies or sects because of their claim to perfection or enlightenment in religious matters. The most noted among them were the Alumbrados (the Enlightened) of Spain in the sixteenth century, an ephemeral society of Belgium and northern France (also called Guérinets) in the seventeenth century, and an association of mystics in southern France in the eighteenth century, combining the doctrines of Swedenborg with the methods of the freemasons.

3. [cap.] See Order of the Illuminati, below.—4. In general, persons who affect to possess extraordinary knowledge or gifts, whether justly or not; persons who lay claim to superior knowledge in any department: often used satirically.

Any one can see that the book which forms the centre of the group is not a Bible, and the illuminati know that it is a photographic album. N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 283.

The great arcanum [the secret of futurity] can be mastered only by the very few who have the requisite intellectual capacity. . . . Let Sir John Herschel say what he pleases, astronomical problems are a mere bagatelle to the problems our illuminati have to solve. H. Rogers.

Order of the Illuminati, a celebrated secret society founded by Professor Adam Weishaupt at Ingolstadt in Bavaria in 1776, originally called the Society of the Perfectibilists. It was deistic and republican in principle, aimed at general enlightenment and emancipation from superstition and tyranny, had an elaborate organization, was to some extent associated with freemasonry, and spread widely through Europe, though the Illuminati were never very numerous. The order excited much antagonism, and was suppressed in Bavaria in 1785, but lingered ★for some time elsewhere.

illumination (i-lū-mi-nā'shon), n. [< ME. illumynacyon = D. illuminatie = G. Dan. Sw. illumination, < OF. illumination, F. illumination = Sp. iluminación = Pg. illuminação = It. illuminazione, < LL. illuminatio(n-), inluminatio(n-), a lightening up, < L. illuminare, inluminare, light up: see illuminate.] 1. Bonfires, illuminations, and other marks of joy appeared, not only in London, but over the whole kingdom.
Bp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1710.

3. Mental enlightenment; knowledge or insight imparted.

The deuelle entirs than by fals illumynacyons, and fals sownnes and swetnes, and dyssaues a mans saule.
Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 17.

By leaving them [men] to God's immediate care for farther illumination, he doth not bid them depend upon extraordinary revelation. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. vi.

There is no difficulty so great in Scripture but that, by the supernatural illuminations of God's Spirit concurring with our natural endeavours, it is possible to be mastered.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. ix.

4. In a special use, the doctrine of the Illuminati; worship of enlightenment or knowledge.

One among many results of Scott's work was to turn the tide against the Illumination, of which Voltaire, Diderot, and the host of Encyclopædists were the high priests.
J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 105.

5. Pictorial ornamentation of books and manuscripts by hand, as practised in the middle ages; adornment by means of pictures, designs, and letters in flat colors, gilt, etc., practised especially in devotional works: as, the art of illumination.

Perfect illumination is only writing made lovely; the moment it passes into picture-making it has lost its dignity and function. Ruskin, Lectures on Art, § 143.

6. A representation or design in an illuminated work: as, the illuminations of a psalter.

In a glorious large folio Salisbury Missal, on vellum, and written out towards the middle of the fourteenth century, now lying open before me, the T [beginning the canon or Te igitur] is so drawn as to hold within it an illumination of Abraham about to slay his son Isaac.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 103.

Circle of illumination, that circle on the earth which separates places where it is day from places where it is night; that great circle on the earth whose plane is perpendicular to the line joining the centers of the earth and sun.—Direct illumination. See direct.

illuminatism (i-lū'mi-nā-tizm), n. [< illuminate, a., + -ism.] Same as illuminism.

illuminative (i-lū'mi-nā-tiv), a. [= F. illuminatif = Sp. iluminativo = Pg. It. illuminativo; as illuminate + -ive.] Having the power of producing or giving light; tending to enlighten or inform; illustrative.

We then enter into the illuminative way of religion, and set upon the acquist of virtues, and the purchase of spiritual graces. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 70.

What makes itself and other things be seen (as being accompanied by light) is called fire; what admits the illuminative action of fire, and is not seen, is called air.
Sir K. Digby, Nature of Bodies, iv.

Illuminative month. Same as synodical month (which see, under month).

illuminato (il-lö-mi-nä'tō), n. [It.: see illuminate, a.] One of the illuminati; a person claiming to possess exceptional enlightenment.

illusion (i-lū'zhọn), n. [= D. illusie = G. Dan. Sw. illusion = F. illusion = Pr. illusio = Sp. ilusión = Pg. illusão = It. illusione, < L. illusio(n-), inlusio(n-), a mocking, jesting, irony, < illudere, inludere, pp. illusus, inlusus, play with, mock: see illude.] 1. That which illudes or deceives; an unreal vision presented to the bodily or mental eye; deceptive appearance; false show.

All her furniture was like Tantalus's gold described by Homer, no substance, but mere illusions.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 447.

Have you more strange illusions, yet more mists,
Through which the weak eye may be led to error?
Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, v. i.

Still less can appearance and illusion be taken as identical. For truth or illusion is not to be found in the objects of intuition, but in the judgments upon them, so far as they are thought. It is therefore quite right to say that the senses never err, not because they always judge rightly, but because they do not judge at all.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. by Max Müller), p. 293.

The cleverest, the acutest men are often under an illusion about women; . . . their good woman is a queer thing, half doll, half angel; their bad woman almost always a fiend. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xx.

Specifically — 2. In psychol., a false perception due to the modification of a sense impression by associated ideas: distinguished from false appearances due to the imperfection of the bodily organs of sense, such as irradiation, and from hallucinations, in which no sense impression is involved. See hallucination, 2. — 3. The act of deceiving or imposing upon any one; deception; delusion; mockery.

I told my lord the duke, by the devil's illusions
The monk might be deceiv'd. Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 2.

In Cappadocia was seated the Citie Comana, wherein was a Temple of Bellona, and a great multitude of such as were there inspired and rauished by deuillish illusion.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 320.

This world is all a fleeting show,
For man's illusion given.
Moore, This World is all a Fleeting Show.

The daring was only an illusion of the spectator.
Emerson, Courage.

4. A thin and very transparent kind of tulle. — Fantastic illusion, a perception which is influenced by an excited imagination, as when a bush is supposed to be a bear. — Physiological illusion, an illusion in which perception is influenced by memory and ordinary expectation, as when one fails to detect a typographical error: same as illusion, 2. = Syn. Delusion, Illusion, etc. See delusion.

illusionable (i-lū'zhọn-a-bl), a. [< illusion + -able.] Subject to illusions; liable to be deceived; easily imposed upon. [Rare.]

Burke was not a young poet, but an old and wary statesman, . . . one who had been in the maturity of his powers and reputation when those illusionable youths [Wordsworth and Coleridge] were in their cradles.
The Academy, Sept. 6, 1879, p. 167.

illusionist (i-lū'zhọn-ist), n. [< illusion + -ist.] 1. One who is subject to illusion; one who trusts in illusions.

The man of sense is the visionary or illusionist, fancying things as permanencies, and thoughts as fleeting phantoms. Alcott, Tablets, p. 174.

2. One who produces illusions for deception or entertainment; specifically, a sleight-of-hand performer.

Jugglers, and illusionists, and sleight-of-hand performers of every grade, prefer examining committees composed of leading citizens — and instinctively dread the criticism of children and of day-laborers, who, being unable to read or write, or to think or reason according to the books, are obliged to trust their instincts.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 337.

illusive (i-lū'siv), a. [= Sp. ilusivo = Pg. illusivo; < L. as if illusivus*, < illudere, inludere, pp. illusus, inlusus, illude: see illude.] Deceiving by illusion; deceitful; false; illusory.

I am that Truth, thou some illusive spright.
B. Jonson, The Barriers.

In yonder mead behold that vapour
Whose vivid beams illusive play;
Far off it seems a friendly taper
To guide the traveller on his way.
J. G. Cooper, Tomb of Shakspeare.

illusively (i-lū'siv-li), adv. In an illusive manner.

illusiveness (i-lū'siv-nes), n. The quality of being illusive; deception; false show.

Life to his lovely picture to confer,
Did not extract out of the elements
A certain secret chymik quint-essence.
Du Bartas (trans.).

imagery (im′āj-ri or -ėr-i), n. [< ME. imagerie, ymagerie, < OF. (also F.) imagerie, imagery; as image + -ry.] 1. Representation in an image or by images; formation of images by art; also, images collectively.

Giue euery one his particular name, as Resemblance by Pourtrait or Imagery, which the Greeks call Icon, Resemblance morall or misticall, which they call Parabola, & Resemblance by example, which they call Paradigma.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 201.

You would have thought . . . that all the walls,
With painted imagery, had said at once—
Jesu preserve thee! Shak., Rich. II., v. 2.

Those high chancel screens surmounted by imagery and paintings, by which the chancel arch was often completely filled up. G. Scott, Hist. Eng. Church Architecture, p. 49.

2†. A type or general likeness; similitude.

Dress your people unto the imagery of Christ.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 127.

They are our brethren, and pieces of the same imagery with ourselves. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 53.

3. Descriptive representation; exhibition of ideal images to the mind; figurative illustration.

I wish there may be in this poem any instance of good imagery. Dryden.

That poverty of thought and profusion of imagery which are at once the defect and the compensation of all youthful poetry. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 215.

4. Mental representation; formation of images in the mind; fanciful or fantastic imagination.

It might be a mere dream which he saw; the imagery of a melancholick fancy. Bp. Atterbury.

What can thy imagery of sorrow mean?
Prior, Solomon, ii.

image-worship (im′āj-wėr″ship), n. The worship of images; as a term of reproach, the worship of idols; idolatry. The veneration of images, as the crucifix, or paintings or statues of the Virgin Mary or of the saints, is practised in the Roman Catholic and Oriental churches. The Roman Catholic doctrine concerning such veneration is, "that the images of Christ, of the Virgin Mother of God, and of the other saints, are to be had and retained particularly in temples, and that due honor and veneration are to be given them; not that any divinity, or virtue, is believed to be in them, on account of which they are to be worshipped; or that any thing is to be asked of them; or that trust is to be reposed in images, as was of old done by the Gentiles, who placed their hope in idols; but because the honor which is shown them is referred to the prototypes which those images represent; in such wise that by the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover the head and prostrate ourselves, we adore Christ, and we venerate the saints whose similitude they bear." Decrees of the Council of Trent (quoted in Schaff's "Creeds of Christendom," II. 201).

imagilet†, n. [< It. as if imagiletto*, < imagine, immagine, image: see image and -let.] A small image.

Italy affords finer alabaster, whereof those imagilets wrought at Leghorn are made.
Fuller, Worthies, Staffordshire, III. 124.

imaginable (i-maj′i-na-bl), a. [< F. imaginable = Pr. ymaginable = Sp. imaginable = Pg. imaginavel = It. imaginabile, now immaginabile, also immaginevole, < ML. imaginabilis, < L. imaginari, imagine: see imagine.] Capable of being imagined or conceived.

He ran into all the extravagances imaginable.
Steele, Spectator, No. 82.

imaginableness (i-maj′i-na-bl-nes), n. The state of being imaginable.

imaginably (i-maj′i-na-bli), adv. So as to be capable of being imagined; in a conceivable manner; possibly.

We found it so exceeding (and scarce imaginably) difficult a matter to keep out the air from getting at all in at any imperceptible hole or flaw. Boyle, Works, I. 10.

imaginal (i-maj′i-nal), a. [= OF. imaginal, < LL. imaginalis, figurative, < L. imago (imagin-), image, figure: see image.] 1. Characterized by imagination; imaginative. [Rare.]—2. Given to the use of rhetorical figures or images. North British Rev. [Rare.]—3. In entom., of or pertaining to the imago or perfect state of an insect.—Imaginal disk. See the extract.

The apodal maggot [of Muscidæ], when it leaves the egg, carries in the interior of its body certain regularly arranged discoidal masses of indifferent tissue, which are termed imaginal disks. . . . As the imaginal disks develop, the preëxisting organs contained in the head and thorax of the larva undergo complete or partial resolution. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 386.

imaginant† (i-maj′i-nant), a. and n. [= F. imaginant = It. immaginante, < L. imaginan(t-)s, ppr. of imaginari, imagine: see imagine.] I. a. Imagining; conceiving.

And (we will enquire) what the force of imagination is, either upon the body imaginant, or upon another body.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 900.

II. n. One who imagines; an imaginer.

It is an inquiry of great depth and worth concerning imagination, how and how far it altereth the body proper of the imaginant.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 186.

Story is full of the wonders it works upon hypochondrical imaginants; to whom the grossest absurdities are infallible certainties, and free reason an impostour.
Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xi.

imaginarily (i-maj′i-nā-ri-li), adv. By means of the imagination; in imagination.

You make her tremble;
Do you not see 't imaginarily?
Ford, Lady's Trial, ii. 1.

imaginariness (i-maj′i-nā-ri-nes), n. The condition or quality of being imaginary.

imaginarity (i-maj-i-nar′i-ti), n. [< imaginary + *-ty*2.] In math., the state of being imaginary.

imaginary (i-maj′i-nā-ri), a. and n. [= F. imaginaire = Pr. imaginari = Sp. Pg. imaginario = It. immaginario, < L. imaginarius, seeming, imaginary, LL. also, lit., pertaining to an image, < imago (imagin-), an image: see image.]

I. a. 1. Existing only in imagination or fancy; due to erroneous belief or conception; not real; baseless; fancied: opposed to actual.

Besides real diseases, we are subject to many that are only imaginary, for which the physicians have invented imaginary cures. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iv. 6.

Imaginary ills and fancied tortures. Addison, Cato.

Most of the names throughout the work are as imaginary as those of its pretended authors.
Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 192.

Nor, surely, did he miss
Some pale, imaginary bliss
Of earlier sights whose inner landscape still was Swiss.
Lowell, Agassiz, iv. 2.

2. In math., unreal and feigned in accordance with the theory of imaginary quantities.—Departure of an imaginary quantity, its argument. See argument, 8.—Imaginary calculus, ens, etc. See the nouns.—Imaginary coördinate, a coördinate whose value is imaginary.—Imaginary curve, a feigned curve every point of which is imaginary.—Imaginary envelop, the real curve which results from the substitution for the imaginary coördinates, $x = a + bi$, $y = c + di$, of $x' = a + b$, $y' = c + d$, upon the assumption that dy/dx is real.—Imaginary exponent, an exponent which is an imaginary quantity.—Imaginary geometry, analytical geometry in which the coördinates are allowed to take imaginary values.—Imaginary integral, an integral which appears under an imaginary form, usually on account of an imaginary constant being added to it.—Imaginary line, a feigned line some of the coefficients of the equation to which are imaginary.—Imaginary point, in analytical geom., a feigned point one or more of the coördinates of which are imaginary quantities.—Imaginary projection, a central projection from an imaginary center or upon an imaginary plane.—Imaginary quantity, in alg., an expression of the form $A + Bi$, where i is a symbol the square of which is negative unity (−1). The object of introducing imaginary quantities is to avoid a multitude of distinct cases between which it is not desired to discriminate, and to state what is true in general terms. Thus, a quadratic equation, as $Ax^2 + Bx + C = 0$, is said to have two roots. But these roots are real and distinct only if $B^2 - 4AC$ is positive. If this quantity vanishes, the two roots coalesce; and if it is negative, they become imaginary. The introduction of imaginaries greatly facilitates the reasoning of mathematics, even in cases where the conclusion has nothing to do with imaginaries. The greater part of the known propositions of higher analytical geometry are only true when account is taken of imaginary quantities. Imaginary quantities are feigned quantities, or they may be considered as quantities outside the ordinary system of quantity. Also called impossible quantity.—Imaginary tangent, a feigned tangent which is an imaginary line.—Imaginary transformation, a transformation by means of equations containing imaginary coefficients.—Syn. 1. Ideal, fanciful, fancied, visionary, unreal, shadowy, Utopian. Imaginary and imaginative are never synonymous: imaginary means existing only in the imagination; imaginative means possessed of or showing an active imagination.

II. n.; pl. imaginaries (-riz). In alg., an imaginary expression or quantity.—Conjugate imaginaries. See conjugate.

imaginatet (i-maj′i-nāt), a. [< L. imaginatus, pp. of imaginare, give an image of: see image, v.] Imaginative.

Whereas the imaginate facultie of other living creatures is unmoveable, and alwaies continueth in one.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, vii. 12.

imagination (i-maj-i-nā′shon), n. [< ME. imaginacioun, ymaginacioun, < OF. ymagination, ymaginacion, F. imagination = Pr. ymaginatio, emagenassio = Sp. imaginación = Pg. imaginação = It. immaginazione, < L. imaginatio(n-), imagination, < imaginari, imagine: see imagine.] 1. The act or faculty of forming a mental image of an object, or the generic name for the totality of such images; consciousness of objects other than those now presented to the senses; the reproduction or combination of memories of sense-objects; especially, the higher form of this process manifested in poetry and art. Imagination is commonly divided into reproductive and productive; reproductive imagination being the act or faculty of reproducing images stored in the memory under the suggestion of associated images; productive imagination being the creative imagination which designedly recombines former experiences into new images. The phrase productive imagination is also used in the Kantian philosophy to denote the pure transcendental imagination, or that faculty by which the parts of the intuitions of space and time are combined into continua.

The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.
Such tricks hath strong imagination;
That, if it would but apprehend some joy,
It comprehends some bringer of that joy;
Or, in the night, imagining some fear,
How easy is a bush suppos'd a bear.
Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

It is evident that true imagination is vastly different from fancy; far from being merely a playful outcome of mental activity, a thing of joy and beauty only, it performs the initial and essential functions in every branch of human development. Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 201.

2. An image in the mind; a formulated conception or idea.

Experience techith that colerik men geueth to summe ymagynaciouns, and sangueyn men ben ocupied aboute summe othere ymagynaciouns.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 17.

My brain, methinks, is like an hour-glass,
Wherein my imaginations run like sands.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

He that uses the word "tarantula" without having any imagination or idea of what it stands for pronounces a good word, but so long means nothing at all by it.
Locke, Human Understanding, III. x. 32.

3. The act of devising, planning, or scheming; a contrivance; scheme; device; plot.

Wenynge is no wysdome ne wyse ymagynacioun, Homo proponit et deus disponit and gouerneth alle good vertues. Piers Plowman (B), xx. 33.

Thou hast seen all their vengeance and all their imaginations against me. Lam. iii. 60.

I was at my wits' end, and was brought into many imaginations what to do.
Capt. R. Bodenham (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 35).

4. A baseless or fanciful opinion.

For my purpose of proceeding in the profession of the law, so far as to a title, you may be pleased to correct that imagination where you find it. Donne, Letters, xxxii.

We are apt to think that space, in itself, is actually boundless; to which imagination the idea of space or expansion of itself naturally leads us.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xvii. 4.

Combinatory imagination. See combinatory.—Creative imagination. See creative.—Syn. 1. Imagination, Fancy. By derivation and early use fancy has the same meaning as imagination, but the words have become more and more distinctly separated. (See Wordsworth's preface to his "Lyrical Ballads.") Imagination is the more profound, earnest, logical. Fancy is lighter, more sportive, and often more purely creative. We call "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" works of Shakspere's imagination, the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "The Tempest" of his fancy.

Consider for a moment if ever the Imagination has been so embodied as in Prospero, the Fancy as in Ariel, the brute Understanding as in Caliban.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 199.

Warm glowing colors fancy spreads
On objects not yet known.
Mrs. H. More, David and Goliath, ii.

imaginational (i-maj-i-nā′shon al), a. [< imagination + -al.] Of or relating to the imagination; imaginary.

imaginative (i-maj′i-nā-tiv), a. [< ME. imaginatif, < OF. (and F.) imaginatif = Pr. ymaginatiu = Sp. Pg. imaginativo = It. immaginativo, < ML. imaginativus*, < L. imaginari, pp. imaginatus, imagine: see imagine.] 1. Forming images; endowed with imagination; given to imagining: as, the imaginative faculty; an imaginative person.

Milton had a highly imaginative, Cowley a very fanciful mind. Coleridge.

Of all people children are the most imaginative.
Macaulay, Mitford's Hist.

Sir Thomas Browne, our most imaginative mind since Shakespeare. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 153.

2. Characterized by or resulting from imagination; exhibiting or indicating the faculty of imagination.

I think it [the third canto of the Purgatorio] the most perfect passage of its kind in the world, the most imaginative, the most picturesque. Macaulay, Dante.

The more indolent and imaginative complexion of the Eastern nations makes them much more impressible.
Emerson, Eloquence.

His [Ælfred's] love of strangers, his questionings of travellers and scholars, betray an imaginative restlessness.
J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 168.

3†. Inquisitive; suspicious; jealous.

Nothyng list hym to been ymaginatyf,
If any wight had spoke whil he was oute
To hire [her] of love, he hadde of it no doubt.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 366.

The kynge enclyned well thereto, but the duke of Burgoyne, who was sage and ymagynatyue, wolde nat agree therto. Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. clxxxi.

=Syn. Inventive, creative, poetical. See imaginary.

imaginatively (i-maj′i-nā-tiv-li), adv. In an imaginative manner; with or by the exercise of imagination.

To write imaginatively a man should have—imagination! Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 35.

imaginativeness (i-maj′i-nā-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being imaginative.

imagine (i-maj′in), v.; pret. and pp. imagined, ppr. imagining. [< ME. imaginen, imagenen, < OF. ymaginer, imaginer, F. imaginer = Pr. imaginar, ymaginar, emaginar = Sp. Pg. imaginar = It. immaginare, < L. imaginari, picture to oneself, fancy, imagine, < imago (imagin-), a copy, likeness, image: see image.] I. trans. 1. To form a mental image of; produce by the imagination; especially, to construct by the productive imagination.

aboute the poynt of the gret Compas, that is clept the Centre, be made another litille Compas.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 185.

Our view of any transaction . . . will necessarily be imperfect . . . unless we can . . . imagine ourselves the agents or spectators.
Whately, On Bacon's Essay on Studies.

And far beyond,
Imagined more than seen, the skirts of France.
Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

2. To conceive in the mind; suppose; conjecture.

The grettyst preseruacion of peas and gode rule to be hadde within the toune and shire of Bristowe that can be ymagened. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 426.

That which hitherto we have set down is . . . sufficient to shew their brutishness, which imagine that religion and virtue are only as men will account of them.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 10.

Well, I will lock his counsel in my breast;
And what I do imagine, let that rest.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 5.

If the Rebellion is at all suppressed in any time, I imagine some of our troops will go. Walpole, Letters, II. 15.

3. To contrive in purpose; scheme; devise.

How long will ye imagine mischief against a man?
Ps. lxii. 3.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Surmise, Guess, etc. (see conjecture), fancy, picture to one's self, apprehend, believe, suppose, deem.—3. To plan, frame, scheme.

II. intrans. 1. To form images or conceptions; exercise imagination.—2. To suppose; fancy; think.

The matter was otherwise received than they imagined.
Bacon, Physical Fables, ii.

My sister is not so defenceless left
As you imagine. Milton, Comus, l. 415.

imaginer (i-maj'i-nėr), n. 1. One who imagines, or forms ideas or conceptions; a contriver.

Others think also that these imaginers invented that they spake of their own heads.
North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 121.

2†. A plotter; a schemer.

For men of warre inclosed in fortresses are sore imaginers. Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. clxvii.

imagines, n. Latin plural of imago.

imaging (im'ā̤j-ing), n. [Verbal n. of image, v.] The forming of mental images; expression by means of imagery.

Imaging is, in itself, the very height and life of poetry.
Dryden, State of Innocence, Pref.

imagining (i-maj'i-ning), n. [< ME. imagininge; verbal n. of imagine, v.] 1. The act of forming images in the mind.—2. That which is imagined.

Present fears
Are less than horrible imaginings.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 3.

3†. Scheming; plot; contrivance.

There were iij lordes came on to the kyng, Desireng hym on huntyng for to goo, ffull ontrewly ther with ymagenyng.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 963.

imaginous† (i-maj'i-nus), a. [= It. immaginoso, imaginoso, < ML. imaginosus*, < L. imago (imagin-), image: see image.] Full of or characterized by imagination; imaginative.

There is a kind of cure
To fright a lingering fever from a man
By an imaginous fear.
Chapman, Mons. D'Olive, v. 1.

imago (i-mā'gō), n.; pl. imagos, imagines (-gōz, i-maj'i-nēz). [NL. use of L. imago, an image, likeness: see image.] In entom., the final, perfect stage or state of an insect, after it has undergone all its transformations and become capable of reproduction. The name is due to the fact that such an insect, having passed through its larval stages, and having, as it were, cast off its mask or disguise, has become a true representation or image of its species. See cut under Diptera.

imam, imâm, imaum (i-mäm', i-mâm'), n. [= F. Sp. Pg. iman = Pers. Turk. imām, < Ar. imām, a guide, chief, leader, < amma, walk before, preside.] A Mohammedan chief or leader. Specifically—(a) The religious title of the four successors of Mohammed, and of the four great doctors of the four orthodox sects; hence, a Mohammedan prince or religious leader: as, the Imam of Muscat. (b) The title of the great leaders of the Shiites or Shiahs. These are Ali, believed by them to have been constituted by Mohammed the Imam or head of the faithful (called calif by the Sunnis), and his ten successors, the twelfth being yet to come in the person of the Mahdi or Messiah predicted by Mohammed. (c) The person who leads the daily prayers in the mosque, and receives its revenues.

The word imâm literally means the chief, or guide. In public prayer it signifies the officiating minister, whose words the people repeat in a low voice, and whose gestures they imitate; he is a delegate of the supreme Imâm, the successor of Mahomet.
J. Darmesteter, The Mahdi (trans.), p. 87.

imamate (i-mäm'āt), n. [< imam + -ate[3].] The office or function of an imam; the califate.

The caliphate . . . is also called El Imámah, the Imamate. Encyc. Brit., XII. 714.

imaret (im'a̤-ret), n. [Turk. imāret.] A kind of hospice or hostelry for the free accommodation of Mohammedan pilgrims and other travelers in the Turkish empire.

Their Hospitals they call Imarets; of these there are great vse, because they want Innes in the Turkes dominions. They found them for the reliefe of the poore, and of Trauellers, where they haue food allowed them (differing according to the vse of the place), and lodging places, without beds. They are open for the most part to all men of all religions. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 299.

On the brink
Of a small imaret's rustic fount.
Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

imaum, n. See imam.

imbalm†, v. t. An obsolete form of embalm.

imban (im-ban'), v. t. [< in-[1] + ban[1].] To excommunicate, in a civil sense; cut off from the rights of man, or exclude from the common privileges of humanity. J. Barlow. [Rare.]

imband (im-band'), v. t. [< in-[1] + band[1].] To form into a band or bands. [Rare.]

Beneath full sails inbanded nations rise. J. Barlow.

imbank†, v. t. An obsolete form of embank.

imbankment†, n. An obsolete form of embankment.

imbannered (im-ban'ėrd), a. [< in-[2] + banner + -ed[2].] Furnished with banners.

imbar† (im-bär'), v. t. To bar out. See embar.

So do the kings of France unto this day.
Howbeit they would hold up this Salique law,
To bar your highness claiming from the female;
And rather choose to hide them in a net
Than amply to imbar their crooked titles,
Usurp'd from you and your progenitors.
Shak., Hen. V., i. 2.

[The sense of imbar in this passage is disputed; it may be an error. Some editions have imbare, which is defined "to make or lay bare; expose."] imbargo†, n. An obsolete form of embargo.

imbark†, v. An obsolete form of embark.

imbarkation†, n. An obsolete form of embarkation.

imbarkment†, n. Same as embarkment.

imbarren†, v. t. Same as embarren.

imbase†, v. t. Same as embase.

imbastardize† (im-bas'tä̤r-dīz), v. t. Same as embastardize.

imbathe† (im-bāŦʜ'), v. t. Same as embathe.

imbattle (im-bat'l), v. t. Same as embattle[2].

imbattled (im-bat'ld), p. a. Same as embattled.

imbay†, v. t. An obsolete form of embay[1].

imbayed (im-bād'), p. a. Same as embayed.

imbecile (im'be-sil or im-bes'il), a. and n. [< OF. imbecile, imbecille, F. imbécile = Sp. Pg. imbecil = It. imbecille, < L. imbecillis, inbecillis, usually imbecillus, inbecillus, weak, feeble; origin unknown. The common derivation < in, on, + bacillus, a staff (as if referring to the feeble steps of age), is improbable. The first syllable is more likely in- priv. Hence imbecile, v., and its doublet embezzle, q. v.] I. a. 1. Without physical strength; feeble; impotent; helpless. [Rare.]

We in a manner were got out of God's possession; were in respect to him become imbecile and lost.
Barrow, Works, II. xxii.

2. Mentally feeble; fatuous; having the mental faculties undeveloped or greatly impaired. See imbecility.

The man became Imbecile; his one word was "desolate."
Dead for two years before his death was he.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. Marked by mental feebleness or incapacity; indicating weakness of mind; inane; stupid: as, imbecile efforts; an imbecile speech.

To Americans, the whole system of Italian education seems calculated to reduce women to a state of imbecile captivity before marriage. Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

=Syn. 2 and 3. Foolish, driveling, idiotic. See debility.

II. n. One who is imbecile.

imbecile† (im'be-sil or im-bes'il), v. t. [Earlier also imbecil, imbecill, imbecell, etc., and, with devious forms, imbezzle, embezzle, etc. (see embezzle, ult. a doublet of imbecile, v.); from the adj.] 1. To make imbecile; weaken.

It is a sad calamity, that the fear of death shall so imbecile man's courage and understanding that he dares not suffer the remedy of all his calamities.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iii. § 7.

2. To embezzle.

Princes must, in a special manner, be guardians of pupils and widows, not suffering their persons to be oppressed, or their states imbeciled, or in any sense be exposed to the rapine of covetous persons.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, iii. 2.

He brought from thence abundance of brave armes, which were here reposited; but in the late warres much of the armes was imbecell'd.
Aubrey's Wilts, Royal Soc. MS., p. 240. (Halliwell.) imbecilitate† (im-be-sil'i-tāt), v. t. [< imbecility + -ate[2].] To weaken; render feeble.

imbecility (im-be-sil'i-ti), n. [< OF. imbecilete, imbecillite, F. imbécillité = Sp. imbecilidad = Pg. imbecillidade = It. imbecillità, < L. imbecillita(t-)s, inbecillita(t-)s, weakness, feebleness, < imbecillis, inbecillis, weak: see imbecile, a.] The condition or quality of being imbecile or impotent; weakness of either body or mind, but especially of the latter. Mental imbecility is such a weakness of mind, owing to defective development or to loss of faculty, as to incapacitate its subject for the ordinary duties of life, and for legal consent, choice, or responsibility.

Cruelty . . . argues not only a depravedness of nature, but also a meanness of courage and imbecility of mind.
Sir W. Temple, Introd. to Hist. Eng.

No one can doubt that his [Petrarch's] poems exhibit, amidst some imbecility and more affectation, much elegance, ingenuity, and tenderness. Macaulay, Dante.

Though to the larger and more trifling part of the sex [men] imbecility in females is a great enhancement of their personal charms, there is a portion of them too reasonable and too well-informed themselves to desire anything more in woman than ignorance.
Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, xiv.

=Syn. Infirmity, Imbecility, etc. (see debility); feebleness, childishness, idiocy, dotage.

imbed, v. t. See embed.

imbellic (im-bel'ik), a. [< L. in- priv. + bellicus, warlike: see bellic. Cf. L. imbellis, inbellis, unwarlike, < in- priv. + bellum, war.] Not warlike or martial; unwarlike. [Rare.]

The imbellick peasant, when he comes first to the field, shakes at the report of a musket.
F. Junius, Sin Stigmatized, p. 423.

imbellish†, v. t. An obsolete form of embellish.

imbellishing†, n. Same as embellishment.

The devices and imbellishings of man's imagination.
Milton, Church-Government, i. 2.

York Plays, p. 6.

II. prep. Amid; among.

My lorde! we haue bourded with this boy,
And holden hym full hote emelle vs.
York Plays, p. 269.

imide (ī′mid or ī′mīd), n. [An arbitrary variation of amide.] In chem., a substituted ammonia in which two hydrogen atoms of ammonia are replaced by a bivalent acid radical, and the whole acts as a monobasic acid. An imide therefore contains the group NH, as succinimide, $C_2H_4(CO)_2NH$.

imitability (im″i-tạ-bil′i-ti), n. [< imitable: see -bility.] The character of being imitable.

According to the multifariousness of this imitability, so are the possibilities of being. Norris.

imitable (im′i-tạ-bl), a. [< F. imitable = Sp. imitable = Pg. imitavel = It. imitabile, < L. imitabilis, that may be imitated, < imitari, imitate: see imitate.] 1. Capable of being imitated or copied.

The rapid courses of the heavenly bodies are rather imitable by our thoughts than our corporeal motions. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 33.

Simple and imitable virtues, which are within every man's reach, but which, unfortunately, are not exercised by many, or this world would be a paradise. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 28.

2. Worthy of imitation. [Rare.]

As acts of parliament are not regarded by most imitable writers, I account the relation of them improper for history. Sir J. Hayward.

imitableness (im′i-tạ-bl-nes), n. The quality of being imitable; imitability.

imitancy (im′i-tạn-si), n. [< imitan(t) + -cy.] A tendency to imitate; the habit of imitating. [Rare.]

The servile imitancy . . . of mankind might be illustrated under the different figure, itself nothing original, of a flock of sheep. Carlyle, Misc., III. 67.

imitant (im′i-tạnt), n. [= It. imitante, < L. imitan(t-)s, ppr. of imitari, imitate: see imitate.] That which imitates; hence, a counterfeit article. [Rare.]

The tendency, therefore, is to lower the quality and finish of confectionery, to foster the use of imitants and adulterants, and to give the well known houses a monopoly of the business. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 135.

imitate (im′i-tāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. imitated, ppr. imitating. [< L. imitatus, pp. of imitari (> It. imitare = Sp. Pg. imitar = F. imiter), copy, portray, imitate, a deponent freq., < ✓ im,* whence also imago (imagin-), a copy, image: see image.] 1. To use as a model or pattern; make a copy, counterpart, or semblance of.

The ornament [of Italian thirteenth-century painted glass] shows the influence of Byzantine conventions, but the ornamentists imitated natural forms of foliage sooner than northern artists. Encyc. Brit., X. 668.

2. To take example by, in action or manner; follow or endeavor to copy as an exemplar; act in the manner or character of; pattern after.

Despise wealth and imitate a god. Cowley.

All we ought, or can, in this dark State,
Is, what we have admir'd, to imitate.
Congreve, To the Memory of Lady Gethin.

The tendency to imitate those about us is a very important aid to the development of the will.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 612.

=Syn. Imitate, Counterfeit, Mimic, Ape, Mock. Imitate is the general word for the expression of the idea common to these five words. To counterfeit is to imitate exactly or as closely as possible, more often for a dishonest purpose; to mimic is to imitate in sport or ridicule, as to mimic one's affectations in speech or carriage; to ape is to imitate with servility. Mock, whose first meaning was to imitate in derision, has changed ground so as now generally to mean to deride by imitation, or, still more broadly, to treat with scorn, to tantalize.

imitation (im-i-tā′shọn), n. and a. [= F. imitation = Sp. imitación = Pg. imitação = It. imitazione, < L. imitatio(n-), imitation, < imitari, imitate: see imitate.] I. n. 1. The act of imitating; an imitating or copying.

Imitation is a facultie to expresse liuelie and perfitelie that example which ye go about to fol[l]ow. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 116.

It seemeth the idolatrous Priests carried the Tabernacle of their Idoll on their shoulder, in apish imitation of the true Priests and Leuites. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 68.

The peculiar notes of birds are acquired by imitation.
A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 222.

2. That which is made or produced by imitating; hence, in general, a likeness or resemblance; a simulated reproduction or representation; more loosely, a likeness or resemblance in general.

Both these arts are not only true imitations of nature, but of the best nature.
Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

Pleasing and ingenious imitations of the manner of the great masters appear. Macaulay, Dryden.

The waiters exhibited in their eagerness a good imitation of unselfish service.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 30.

3. Specifically, in music, the process or act of repeating a melodic phrase or theme, either at a different pitch or key from the original, or in a different voice-part, or with some rhythmic or intervallic modification not so great as to destroy the resemblance. The original phrase or theme is often called the antecedent, and the imitation the consequent. Imitation is reckoned one of the chief beauties of polyphonic writing and of composition in general. Its esthetic value lies in the combined unity and variety that it introduces into intricate works, and in the opportunity it affords for ingenuity and skill. Imitation is said to be strict when the succession of intervals is identical in both antecedent and consequent, and free when some modification of the one appears in the other. The commonest regular varieties of free imitation are: by augmentation (augmented imitation), in which the rhythmic value of the several tones is systematically increased, as when quarter-notes are represented by half-notes; by diminution (diminished imitation), in which the rhythmic value of the several tones is systematically lessened, as when quarter-notes are represented by eighth-notes; by inversion (inverted imitation, inverted counterpoint, or imitation in contrary motion), in which every upward interval in the antecedent is represented in the consequent by an equivalent downward interval, and vice versa; and retrograde or reversed imitation, in which the intervals of the antecedent are taken in reverse order in the consequent. The interval of pitch by which the consequent is separated from the antecedent is indicated by calling the imitation at the fifth, at the octave, etc. Strict imitation is canonic, and the result, if of some extent, is a canon (which see); imitation is also the basis of the fugue (which see).

II. a. Made in imitation; counterfeit; not genuine; copied: as, imitation stone, lace, gold, etc.

imitational (im-i-tā′shọn-ạl), a. [< imitation + -al.] Relating to or characterized by imitation. [Rare.]

imitationist (im-i-tā′shọn-ist), n. [< imitation + -ist.] One who practises imitation; a mere imitator; one who wants originality. Imp. Dict.

imitative (im′i-tā-tiv), a. [= F. imitatif = Sp. Pg. It. imitativo, < ML. imitativus,* < L. imitari, imitate: see imitate.] 1. Imitating or inclined to imitate or copy.

At present, we are become an imitative, not to say a mimic, race. Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xlii.

2. Aiming at imitation; exhibiting or designed to exhibit an imitation of a pattern or model.

The doctrine which he [Aristotle] established, that poetry is an imitative art, when justly understood, is to the critic what the compass is to the navigator.
Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

3. Formed after or presenting a similitude of a model, pattern, or original.

This temple, less in form, with equal grace,
Was imitative of the first in Thrace.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 527.

In the genesis of language the interjection, even if not technically a part of speech, and the onomatopoetic or imitative words, must be regarded as the primary linguistic utterances. G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xiv.

In the 6th century capital-writing enters on its period of decadence, and the examples of it become imitative.
Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 152.

imitatively (im′i-tā-tiv-li), adv. In an imitative manner; by imitation.

imitativeness (im′i-tā-tiv-nes), n. The character or quality of being imitative.

imitator (im′i-tā-tọr), n. [= F. imitateur = Sp. Pg. imitador = It. imitatore, < L. imitator, one who imitates, < imitari, imitate: see imitate.] One who imitates, copies, or patterns after a model.

A servile imitator, who, without one spark of Cowley's admirable genius, mimicked whatever was least commendable in Cowley's manner. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

imitatorship (im′i-tā-tọr-ship), n. [< imitator + -ship.] The office or state of an imitator.

But when to servile imitatorship
Some spruce Athenian pen is prentized,
'Tis worse than apish.
Marston, Scourge of Villanie, iii. 9.

imitatress (im′i-tā-tres), n. [< imitator + -ess. Cf. imitatrix.] A female imitator.

imitatrix (im′i-tā-triks), n. [= F. imitatrice = It. imitatrice, < L. imitatrix (-tric-), fem. of imitator, an imitator: see imitator.] Same as imitatress.

Friend, they either are men's souls themselves
Or the most wittie imitatrixes of them.
Sir Gyles Goosecappe (1606), iii. 1.

immaculacy (i-mak′ū-lā-si), n. The state of being immaculate.

immaculate (i-mak′ū-lāt), a. [< ME. immaculate = F. immaculé = Sp. inmaculado = Pg. immaculado = It. immacolato, < L. immaculatus, inmaculatus, unspotted, unstained, < in- priv. + maculatus, spotted: see maculate.] 1. Unspotted; spotless; stainless; pure; undefiled; without blemish or impurity: as, an immaculate reputation; immaculate thoughts; an immaculate edition.

"To keep this commandment immaculate and blameless" was to teach the gospel of Christ without mixture of corrupt and unsound doctrine.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 11.

Thou sheer, immaculate, and silver fountain.
Shak., Rich. II., v. 3.

Thy ruin grand
With an immaculate charm which cannot be defaced.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 26.

2. In zoöl. and bot., without spots or colored marks; unicolored.—Immaculate conception, in Rom. Cath. theol., the freedom from original sin which the Virgin Mary possessed from the time of her conception in the womb of her mother: now an established dogma of the church. The controversy regarding this dogma commenced about the twelfth century. It was debated by the schoolmen, the universities, the orders of the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Dominicans, and the councils of Basel and Trent. Opinion gradually prevailed in its favor, and it was formally proclaimed by Pope Pius IX., December 8th, 1854, in the bull "Ineffabilis Deus." The feast of the Immaculate Conception is observed in the Roman Catholic Church on December 8th.

Gregory XV. . . . forbade anyone to accuse those who denied the immaculate conception of heresy or mortal sin.
Catholic Dict., p. 429.

Immaculate Heart. See heart.=Syn. Unspotted, stainless, unsullied, unblemished, untarnished.

immaculately (i-mak′ū-lāt-li), adv. In an immaculate manner; with spotless purity.

immaculateness (i-mak′ū-lāt-nes), n. The character of being immaculate; spotless purity.

Candour and immaculateness of conversation is required of such as are sequestred for God by some vow or consecration. W. Montague, Devoute Essays, I. xii. § 2.

immailed† (im-māld′), a. [< in-[2] + mail[1] + -ed[2].] Wearing mail or armor.

Whilst their inhabitants, like heards of deere
By kingly lyons chas'd, fled from our armes
If any did oppose instructed swarmes
Of men immayl'd.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 4.

immalleable (i-mal′ē-ạ-bl), a. [= Sp. inmaleable; as in-[3] + malleable.] Unmalleable; incapable of being extended by hammering.

Though it [aqua fortis] make not a permanent solution of crude tin, it quickly frets the parts asunder, and reduces it to an immalleable substance.
Boyle, Works, IV. 319.

immanacle (im-man′ạ-kl), v. t.; pret. and pp. immanacled, ppr. immanacling. [< in-[2] + manacle.] To put manacles on; manacle.

Although this corporal rind
Thou hast immanacled. Milton, Comus, l. 665.

immanation (im-ạ-nā′shọn), n. [< L. in, in, + manare, pp. manatus, flow; cf. emanation.] A flowing or entering in.

A quick immanation of continuous fantasies.
Lamb, To Coleridge.

immane (i-mān′), a. [= Pg. immano = It. immane, cruel, savage, < L. immanis, inmanis, huge, vast, cruel, savage, inhuman; perhaps < in- intensive (in-[2]) + magnus, great.] Monstrous in size or character; huge; prodigious; monstrously perverse, savage, cruel, etc. [Archaic.]

What immane difference is there between the twenty-fourth of February and commencement of March?
Evelyn, Sylva, i. 18.

He had been brought very close to that immane and nefandous Burke-and-Hare business which made the blood of civilization run cold in the year 1828.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 44.

immanely (i-mān′li), adv. Monstrously; hugely. [Archaic.]

A man of excessive strength, Valiant, Liberal, and fair of Aspect, but immanely Cruell. Milton, Hist. Eng., i.

immanence (im′ạ-nens), n. [< immanen(t) + -ce.] The condition of being immanent; inherence; indwelling.

Immanence implies the unity of the intelligent principle in creation in the creation itself, and of course includes in it every genuine form of pantheism. Transcendence implies the existence of a separate divine intelligence, and of another and spiritual state of being, intended to perfectionate our own.
J. D. Morell, Manchester Papers, No. 2, p. 108.

A modification of a prevailing Latin conception of the divine transcendence by a clearer and fuller appreciation . . . of the divine immanence. Prog. Orthodoxy, p. 16.

immanency (im′ạ-nen-si), n. Same as immanence.

Christ, as we have seen, never reflected on transcendency and immanency. Westminster Rev., CXXVI. 469.

immanent (im′ạ-nent), a. [= F. immanent = Sp. inmanente = Pg. It. immanente, < LL. immanen(t-)s, inmanen(t-)s, ppr. of immanere, inmanere, remain in or near, < L. in, in, + manere, remain: see remain. Cf. remanent, remnant.] Remaining within; indwelling. This word (in its Latin form, immanens) was introduced in the thirteenth century to express the distinction, of which Aristotle makes much, between doing (or acting within one's self) and making (or producing an external effect). An immanent action is one whose effect remains within the subject and within the same faculty, while a transient or transitive action produces an effect upon something different from the subject, or at least upon something different from the faculty exercised. In modern philosophy the word is applied to the operations of a creator conceived as in organic connection with the creation, and to such a creator himself, as opposed to a transient or transcendent creating and creator from whom the creation is conceived as separated. The doctrine of an immanent deity does not necessarily imply that the world, or the soul of the world, is God, but only that it either is or is in God.

The workes of God, which are either inward and immanent, or outward and transient.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 5.

Conceiving, as well as projecting or resolving, are what the schoolmen call immanent acts of the mind, which produce nothing beyond themselves. But painting is a transitive act, which produces an effect distinct from the operation, and this effect is the picture.
Reid, Intellectual Powers, iv. 1.

In the doctrine of the eternal Son revealing the Father, immanent in nature and humanity as the life and light shining through all created things, as the divine reason in which human reason shares, there was the recognition of . . . the tie which binds the creation to God in the closest organic relationship.
A. Allen, Continuity of Christian Thought.

Immanent act. See act.—Immanent action. See action, and def. above.—Immanent cause. See cause, 1, and efficient cause, under efficient.—Immanent principle, in the Kantian philos., a principle limited to the realm of experience: opposed to transcendental principle.

Immanes (i-mā'nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. immanis, monstrous, enormous: see immane.] A superfamily group, by Newton made an order, of recently extinct gigantic ratite birds of New Zealand, containing the two families Dinornithidæ and Palapterygidæ. Dinornithes is a synonym.

immanifest (i-man'i-fest), a. [= OF. immanifeste = It. immanifesto, < LL. immanifestus, < L. in- priv. + manifestus, manifest.] Not manifest or apparent. [Rare.]

A time not much unlike that which was before time, immanifest and unknown.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 6.

immanity† (i-man'i-ti), n. [= F. immanité = It. immanità, < L. immanita(t-)s, inmanita(t-)s, hugeness, vastness, cruelty, savageness, < immanis, inmanis, huge, cruel, savage: see immane.] The condition of being immane; monstrosity; savageness.

No man can but marvel, saith Comineus, at that barbarous immanity, feral madness, committed betwixt men of the same nation, language, and religion.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 39.

They were so far from doing what Nestorius had suggested that they restrained him from his violence and immanity.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 297.

immantle (im-man'tl), v. t.; pret. and pp. immantled, ppr. immantling. [< *in-*2 + mantle.] To envelop as with a mantle. [Poetical.]

The dewy night had with her frosty shade
Immantled all the world, and the stiff ground Sparkled in ice.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph over Death.

O joy to him in this retreat,
Immantled in ambrosial dark.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxxix.

Immanuel, Emmanuel (i-, e-man'ū-el), n. [LL. Emmanuel, < Gr. Ἐμμανουήλ, < Heb. Immanuel, lit. 'God with us,' < im, with, + anu, us, + el, God.] A name that was to be given to Jesus Christ (Mat. i. 23) as the son born of a virgin predicted in Isa. vii. 14. As a personal name, also written Emanuel.

immarcescible† (im-är-ses'i-bl), a. [Improp. written immarcessible; = F. immarcescible, formerly improp. immarcessible, = Sp. inmarcesible = Pg. immarcescivel = It. immarcescibile, < LL. immarcescibilis, inmarcescibilis, unfading, < L. in- priv. + marcescere, wither, fade: see marcescent.] Unfading.

They should feed the flock of God, and the great Bishop and Shepherd should give them an immarcessible crown.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 351.

immarcescibly† (im-är-ses'i-bli), adv. Unfadingly.

The honour that now I reach at is no less than a crown, and that not fading and corruptible, . . . but immarcessibly eternal, a crown of righteousness, a crown of glory.
Bp. Hall, Invisible World, iii. § 12.

immarginate (i-mär'ji-nāt), a. [< L. in- priv. + NL. marginatus, marginate.] Having no margin. Specifically—(a) In bot., destitute of a rim or border. Gray. (b) In entom., without a defined margin; having no raised or thickened border; without an impressed line parallel to the edge.

immartial (i-mär'shal), a. [< L. in- priv. + martialis, warlike, martial: see martial.] Not martial; not warlike. [Rare.]

Assay not me like one,
Yong and immartiall, with great words, as to an Amazon dame.
Chapman, Iliad, vii.

immask† (im-mask'), v. t. [< *in-*2 + mask.] To cover with or as with a mask; disguise.

Cases of buckram . . . to immask our noted outward garments.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2.

immatchable† (i-mach'a-bl), a. [< *in-*3 + matchable.] Incapable of being matched; peerless.

Where learned More and Gardiner I met,
Men in those times immatchable for wit.
Drayton, Legend of T. Cromwell.

immatchless† (i-mach'les), a. [< *in-*3 (here intensive) + matchless.] Incomparable; matchless.
Davies.

Thou great Soveraigne of the earth,
Onelie immatchlesse Monarchesse of hearts.
G. Markham, Sir R. Grinuile (Ded. to the Fairest).

immaterial (im-ā-tē'ri-al), a. and n. [= F. immatériel = Sp. immaterial = Pg. immaterial = It. immateriale; as *in-*3 + material.] I. a. 1. Not consisting of matter; not material.

Forms immaterial are produced by an efficient cause in the matter: but the matter itself does not contribute towards the action. All forms of natural things, the human soul excepted, are material, which only is immaterial.
Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Angels are spirits immaterial and intellectual.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

The most elementary study of sensation justifies Descartes' position, that we know more of mind than we do of body; that the immaterial world is a firmer reality than the material. Huxley, Sensation and Sensiferous Organs.

2. Without special significance or importance; of no essential consequence; unimportant.

It may seem immaterial whether we shall not recollect each other hereafter. Cowper.

Specifically, in law: (a) Not relevant; having no bearing on the question: as, immaterial evidence. (b) Not absolutely essential to constitute the cause of action or defense: as, an immaterial averment (a statement of unnecessary particulars).—Immaterial cognition. See cognition.—Immaterial form, in metaph. See form.
= Syn. 2. Unessential, non-essential, insignificant.

II. n. Something not material.

As well might nothing bind immensity,
Or passive matter immaterials see,
As these should write by reason, rhyme, and rule,
Or he turn wit whom nature doom'd a fool.
W. Harte, Essay on Satire.

Thus more perfect apprehenders misconceive immaterials; our imaginations paint souls and angels in as dissimilar a resemblance.
Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, vii.

immaterialise, v. t. See immaterialize.

immaterialism (im-ā-tē'ri-al-izm), n. [= F. immatérialisme = Sp. immaterialismo = Pg. immaterialismo; as immaterial + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that immaterial substances or spiritual beings exist or are possible.—2. The doctrine that there is no material world, but that all things exist only in the mind; idealism.

Immaterialism is the doctrine of Bishop Berkeley, that there is no material substance, and that all being may be reduced to mind, and ideas in a mind.
Fleming, Vocab. of Philosophy.

immaterialist (im-ā-tē'ri-al-ist), n. [= F. immatérialiste = Sp. inmaterialista = Pg. immaterialista; as immaterial + -ist.] One who believes in or professes immaterialism.

Going to England very young, about thirteen years ago, he [Berkeley] became founder of a sect there called the immaterialists, by the force of a very curious book upon that subject. Swift, To Carteret, Sept. 3, 1724.

immateriality (im-ā-tē-ri-al'i-ti), n. [= F. immatérialité = Sp. inmaterialidad = Pg. immaterialidade = It. immaterialità; as immaterial + -ity.] 1. The character or quality of being immaterial or spiritual: as, the immateriality of the soul.

There are exterminating angels, that fly wrapt up in the curtains of immateriality and an uncommunicating nature. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 81.

2. An immaterial existence or essence; that which is without matter.

A school of French philosophers to-day . . . speak of man as the union of an organism with an immateriality.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 148.

3. The character of being unimportant, non-essential, or irrelevant.

immaterialize (im-ā-tē'ri-al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. immaterialized, ppr. immaterializing. [= F. immaterialiser = Sp. inmaterializar; as immaterial + -ize.] To make immaterial or incorporeal; separate or free from matter. Also spelled immaterialise.

For though possibly assiduity in the most fixed cogitation be no trouble or pain to immaterializ'd spirits, yet is it more then our embodyed souls can bear without lassitude or distemper. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xii.

immaterially (im-ā-tē'ri-al-i), adv. [< immaterial + *-ly*2.] 1. Not corporeally.—2. Unimportantly; not necessarily or essentially.

immaterialness (im-ā-tē'ri-al-nes), n. The character of being immaterial; immateriality.

immateriate† (im-ā-tē'ri-āt), a. [< *in-*3 + materiate.] Not consisting of matter; incorporeal; immaterial.

And besides, I practise as I do advise: which is, after long inquiry of things immerse in matter, to interpose some subject which is immateriate, or less materiate.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 115.

immatter (i-mat'ėr), n. [< *in-*3 + matter. Cf. immaterial.] That which is immaterial, or not matter. Ashburner, Reichenbach's Dynamics (1851), p. 29, note. [Rare.]

immature (im-ā-tūr'), a. [= OF. immature = Sp. inmaduro = Pg. immaturo = It. immaturo, < L. immaturus, inmaturus, unripe, < in- priv. + maturus, ripe, mature: see mature.] 1. Not mature or ripe; not complete in growth or development; hence, unfinished; not perfected: as, immature fruit; an immature youth; immature plans or counsels.

The earth was form'd, but in the womb as yet
Of waters, embryon immature involved, Appear'd not. Milton, P. L., vii. 277.

2†. Coming before the natural time; premature; too early.

We are pleased, and call not that death immature, if a man lives till seventy. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living.

The immature death of Mr. Robinson in Holland.
C. Mather, Mag. Chris., i. 3.

= Syn. 1. Raw, green, crude, unfinished, undigested.

immatured (im-ā-tūrd'), a. [< *in-*3 + matured.] Not matured; not ripened.

immaturely (im-ā-tūr'li), adv. In an immature manner; unripely; prematurely; crudely.

immatureness (im-ā-tūr'nes), n. Immaturity.

immaturity (im-ā-tū'ri-ti), n. [= OF. immaturite, F. immaturité = It. immaturità, < L. immaturita(t-)s, inmaturita(t-)s, unripeness, < immaturus, inmaturus, unripe: see immature.] The state or character of being immature; unripeness; incompleteness; crudeness.

How far the validity of contracts may be affected by the contractor's immaturity of age, it belongs to human laws to determine. Beattie, Moral Science, iii. 1.

Shelley appears always to have labored under an essential immaturity; it is very possible that if he had lived a hundred years he would never have become a man.
S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 99.

immaze† (im-māz'), v. t. [< *in-*2 + maze.] To involve in a maze or labyrinth; entangle.

The prementioned Planters, by Tolerating all Religions, had immazed themselves in the most intolerable confusions and inextricable thraldomes.
N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 22.

immeability† (im″ē-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< L. as if immeabilita(t-)s*, < immeabilis*, < in- priv. + meabilis, passable, < meare, pass, go: see meatus.] Impassableness; impermeability.

Such a state of the fluids at last affects the tender capillary vessels of the brain, by the viscidity and immeability of the matter impacted in them.
Arbuthnot, Aliments, vi. § 29.

immeasurability (i-mezh″ūr-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< immeasurable: see -bility.] Incapability of being measured; immeasurableness.

immeasurable (i-mezh'ūr-a-bl), a. [= F. immesurable = It. immisurabile; as *in-*3 + measurable; ult. identical with immensurable, q. v.] Incapable of being measured; immense; limitless; indefinitely extensive.

Safe have you gain'd the peaceful port of ease,
Not doom'd to plough th' immeasurable seas.
Pitt, Æneid, iii.

Man's measures cannot mete the immeasurable All.
M. Arnold, Empedocles on Ætna.

immeasurableness (i-mezh'ūr-a-bl-nes), n. The state of being immeasurable or incapable of measurement; limitless extent.

Eternity and immeasurableness belong to thought alone. F. W. Robertson.

immeasurably (i-mezh'ūr-a-bli), adv. To an immeasurable extent or degree.

Where wilds immeasurably spread Seem length'ning as I go.
Goldsmith, The Hermit, st. 2.

immeasured† (i-mezh'ūrd), a. [< *in-*3 + measured.] Unmeasured; unlimited.

They brought forth Geaunts, and such dreadful wights
As far exceeded men in their immeasur'd mights.
Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 8.

A stream, that silently but swiftly glides
To meet eternity's immeasured tides!
Broome, Death.

immechanical† (im-ē-kan'i-kal), a. [< *in-*3 + mechanical.] Not mechanical; not consonant with the laws of mechanics.

Nothing will clear a head possessed with immechanical notions. Mead.

immechanically† (im-ē-kan'i-kal-i), adv. Not mechanically.

immediacy (i-mē'di-a-si), n. [< immedia(te) + -cy.] The character of being immediate.

(a) Direct relation or connection; freedom from any intervening medium.

He asserts that, in his doctrine of perception, the external reality stands, to the percipient mind, face to face, in the same immediacy of relation which the idea holds in the representative theory of the philosophers.
Sir W. Hamilton.

(b) Specifically, the condition of being in direct relation with a head or chief; the feudal rank next to that of the suzerain.

He led our powers;
Bore the commission of my place and person;
The which immediacy may well stand up,
And call itself your brother. Shak., Lear, v. 3.

All immediate church territory was secularized except a little part of that of Mayence, and, this not sufficing, all but six of the fifty-one imperial towns and the villages of the same class lost their immediacy, and were put into the hands of princes who received compensation.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, App. ii., p. 398.

(c) In metaph., direct presence; spontaneous existence, not dependent on anything; absolute or non-relative being.

The a priori aspect or immediacy of thought, where there is a mediation not made by anything external but by a reflection into self, is another name for universality, the complacency or contentment of thought which is so much at ease with itself that it feels an innate aversion to descend to particulars. Hegel, tr. by Wallace.

A primitive immediacy or absolute identity of subject and object at some point back of all of individual experience perhaps is thus postulated.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 172.

immediate (i-mē′di-āt), a. [= F. immédiat = Sp. inmediato = Pg. It. immediato, < ML. immediatus*, not mediate, < L. in- priv. + ML. mediatus, mediate: see mediate, a.] 1. Not separated from its object or correlate by any third or medium; directly related; independent of any intermediate agency or action: opposed to remote: as, an immediate cause.

He hath bin pleas'd to make himselfe the agent and immediat performer of their desires.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

Moses mentions the immediate causes of the deluge, the rains and the waters; and St. Peter mentions the more remote and fundamental causes, that constitution of the heavens. Burnet.

The sensible qualities are the immediate objects of the senses; a substance invested with those qualities, the mediate. Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

The Consistory, like the Bishop, is under the immediate direction of the Holy Governing Synod.
J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 1184.

2. Having no space or object intervening; nearest; proximate; having the closest relation: as, immediate contact; the immediate neighborhood.

What! rate, rebuke, and roughly send to prison
Th' immediate heir of England!
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 2.

These two commandments are immediate to each other, and of the greatest cognation.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 215.

3. Without any time intervening; without any delay; present; instant: often used, like similar absolute expressions, with less strictness than the literal meaning requires: as, an immediate answer; immediate despatch.

'Tis time we twain
Did show ourselves i' the field; and, to that end, Assemble me immediate council.
Shak., A. and C., i. 5.

Immediate are the acts of God, more swift Than time or motion. Milton., P. L., vii. 176.

The dead lulls of tropical seas are the immediate forerunners of tornadoes. De Quincey, Philos. of Rom. Hist.

The commander of the Swiss, and some other officers, were for immediate action. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 12.

4. In metaph., indemonstrable; intuitive; of the character of a direct perception not worked over by the mind. Immediate truths are of two kinds, those which are the direct testimony of the senses, and general axioms: the existence of both kinds is in question.

Where certainty is mediate, one judgment is often spoken of as the ground of another; but a syllogism is still psychologically a single, though not a simple, judgment, and the certainty of it as a whole is immediate.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 83.

Immediate agglutination, certainty, evidence. See the nouns.—Immediate contraries. See contrary.—Immediate good, that which is recognized as an end in itself, and is not merely useful in bringing about some end.—Immediate inference, the name first given by Wolf to a necessary inference from a single premise, because it has no middle term, being a mere transformation of a proposition.—Immediate knowledge. (a) Knowledge of a thing or an event in its existence, as here and now, by a consciousness of its direct presence. In this sense, immediate knowledge does not imply a perception of the thing-in-itself, but only a real and direct consciousness of the reaction between self and not-self. (b) Knowledge of an object as it exists, so that the qualities of our cognition are the qualities of the thing-in-itself.—Immediate testimony, in law, testimony to the personal experience of the witness.

immediately (i-mē′di-āt-li), adv. 1. In an immediate manner; without the intervention of anything; proximately; directly.

Knowing myself to take and hold the said Archbishopric immediately and only of your Highness, and of none other.
Abp. Cranmer's Oath of Office, in R. W. Dixon's Hist. [Church of Eng., iii., note.

If the sun were in the zenith or immediately overhead, the most vivid effects would be found on the horizon.
Spottiswoode, Polarisation, p. 81.

2. Without lapse of time; without delay; instantly.

And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. Mat. viii. 3.

He'll eat but half a dozen bits, and rise immediately.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, ii. 4.

=Syn. 2. Instantaneously, promptly, forthwith, straightway.

immediateness (i-mē′di-āt-nes), n. The character or quality of being immediate, in any sense of that word.

immediatism (i-mē′di-ā-tizm), n. [< immediate + -ism.] The quality of being immediate.

My griefs . . .
Nor less than wounds immedicable
Rankle, and fester, and gangrene.
Milton, S. A., l. 620.

But who rains down
Evil, the immedicable plague?
Shelley, Prometheus Unbound, ii. 4.

immelodious† (im-ē-lō′di-us), a. [< in-[3] + melodious.] Unmelodious.

When immelodious winds but made thee [a lute] move,
And birds on thee their ramage did bestow.
Drummond, Sonnets, ii. 10.

immemorable† (i-mem′ō-ra-bl), a. [= F. immémorable = Sp. inmemorable = Pg. immemoravel = It. immemorabile, immemorial, < L. immemorabilis, inmemorabilis, not worth mentioning, also silent, < in- priv. + memorabilis, to be mentioned: see memorable.] Not memorable; not worth remembering. Minsheu, 1617.

immemorial (im-ē-mō′ri-al), a. [= Sp. inmemorial = Pg. immemorial; as in-[3] + memorial.] Not within the bounds of memory; of unknown duration; extending back beyond record or tradition.

All the laws of this kingdom have some memorials in writing, yet all have not their original in writing; for some obtained their force by immemorial usage or custom.
Sir M. Hale.

A country belonging to a people who were in possession for time immemorial.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xvii.

In the oldest forms of nobility, the origin of the distinction is strictly immemorial; there is no record of the way it began, no record how this and that house in a state came to be looked on as more noble than others.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 282.

immemorially (im-ē-mō′ri-al-i), adv. In an immemorial manner; from time out of mind.

The territory of Saba, which immemorially has been the mart of frankincense, myrrh, and balsam.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 444.

immense (i-mens′), a. and n. [< F. immense = Sp. inmenso = Pg. It. immenso, < L. immensus, inmensus, unmeasured, boundless, < in- priv. + mensus, pp. of metiri, measure: see mete[1], measure.] I. a. 1. So great as to be beyond measurement; immeasurable; limitless; boundless; incomprehensible.

Witness this new-made world, another heaven, . . .
Of amplitude almost immense. Milton, P. L., vii. 620.

God is too large, too immense, and then man is too narrow, too little to be considered; for who can fix his eye upon an atom? Donne, Sermons, vii.

2. Of vast extent, bulk, or quantity; very great; huge; inordinate: as, an immense territory; an immense sum; an immense eater (a colloquial expression).

A corner cupboard, knowingly left open, displayed immense treasures of old silver and well-mended china.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 430.

I could only distinguish an immense vault, like a high cavern, without aisles. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 139.

II. n. Infinite space; immensity. [Poetical.]

When this ball of rock and clay
Crumbles from my feet away,
And the solid shores of sense
Melt into the vague immense.
Whittier, Andrew Rykman's Prayer.

immensely (i-mens′li), adv. To an immense extent or degree; exceedingly.

immenseness (i-mens′nes), n. The character or state of being immense; immensity.

immensible† (i-men′si-bl), a. [< L. in- priv. + mensus, pp. of metiri, measure: see mete[1], measure.] Immeasurable.

For should I touch thy minde (intangible, Fraught with whateuer makes or good or great,
As learning, language, artes immensible,
Witt, courage, courtesie, and all compleat),
I should but straine my skill to do thee wrong.
Davies, To Worthy Persons.

immensity (i-men′si-ti), n.; pl. immensities (-tiz). [= F. immensité = Pr. immensitat, inmensitat = Sp. inmensidad = Pg. immensidade = It. immensità, < L. immensita(t-)s, inmensita(t-)s, unmeasurableness, < immensus, inmensus, unmeasurable: see immense.] 1. The character or state of being immense. (a) Immeasurableness; boundlessness; infinitude.

Through the thick Fogs of Adversity . . . we come to see God, and the Immensity of his Love, in a fuller Proportion. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 55.

By the power we find in ourselves of repeating as often as we will any idea of space, we get the idea of immensity.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xvii. 5.

(b) Vastness; hugeness; enormous extent or degree: as, the immensity of the Roman empire.

A glimpse of the immensity of the material system is granted to the eye of man. Is. Taylor.

All these illustrious worlds,
Lost in the wilds of vast immensity,
Are suns. Blackmore.

Mighty Rome, to the north, lying at no great length in the idle immensity around it.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 172.

3. A vast extent, degree, bulk, or quantity; a very great amount.

immensive† (i-men′siv), a. [< OF. immensif; as immense + -ive.] Immense.

Then this immensive cup
Of aromatike wine,
Catullus, I quaffe up
To that terce muse of thine.
Herrick, Hesperides, p. 84.

immensurability (i-men″sū-ra-bil′i-ti), n. [< immensurable: see -bility.] The quality of being immeasurable; immeasurableness.

immensurable (i-men′sū-ra-bl), a. [= F. immensurable = Sp. inmensurable = Pg. immensuravel = It. immensurabile, < LL. immensurabilis, immeasurable, < L. in- priv. + LL. mensurabilis, mensurable: see mensurable.] Incapable of being measured; immeasurable.

The law of nature, . . . a term of immensurable extent.
Ward.

immensurate (i-men′sū-rāt), a. [< LL. immensuratus, not measured, < L. in- priv. + LL. mensuratus, measured, pp. of mensurare, measure: see mensurate, measure, v.] Unmeasured; immeasurable. [Rare.]

Created nature . . . fell into an immensurate distance from it [heaven]. W. Montague, Devoute Essays, II. ix. § 1.

immer (im′ėr), n. Same as ember-goose.

immerd† (i-mėrd′), v. t. [< F. emmerder, cover with dung, < L. in, on, + merda, dung.] To cover with dung.

Let daws delight to immerd themselves in dung, whilst eagles scorn so poor a game as flies.
Quarles, Emblems, Int.

immerge (i-mėrj′), v.; pret. and pp. immerged, ppr. immerging. [= F. immerger = Sp. inmergir = It. immergere, < L. immergere, inmergere, dip or plunge into, < in, in, + mergere, dip, plunge: see merge. Cf. emerge.] I.† trans. To plunge into or under anything, especially into a fluid; immerse.

The church of God . . . was then holy, not in title only and design, but practically and materially, and persecuted, and not immerged in secular temptations.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 29.

You may immerge it, replied he, into the ocean, and it will stand. Sterne, Sentimental Journey, The Wig.

II. intrans. To disappear by entering into any medium, as a star into the light of the sun, or the moon into the shadow of the earth.

immerger (i-mėr′jėr), n. That which immerges or dives: specifically applied in ornithology to the Mergitores or divers.

immer-goose (im′ėr-gōs), n. A dialectal variant of ember-goose.

immerit† (i-mer′it), n. [< in-[3] + merit, n.] Want of merit or worth; demerit.

When I receive your lines, and find there expressions of a passion, reason and my own immerit tell me it must not be for me. Suckling.

immerited† (i-mer'i-ted), a. [< *in-*3 + merited.] Unmerited.

Those on whom I have in the plenteousest manner showered my bounty and immerited favour have darted on me. King Charles, in the Princely Pelican, p. 279.

immeritous† (i-mer'i-tus), a. [= F. immérité = Sp. inmérito = Pg. It. immerito, < L. immeritus, inmeritus, undeserving, < in- priv. + meritus, deserving: see merit, v.] Undeserving.

And gives sentence that his confuting hath bin employed about frothy, immeritous, and undeserving discourse. Milton, Colasterion.

immersable†, a. [< L. immersabilis, that cannot be sunk.] Incapable of being immersed. Cockeram, 1623.

immerse (i-mėrs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. immersed, ppr. immersing. [< L. immersus, inmersus, pp. of immergere, inmergere, dip or plunge into: see immerge.] 1. To plunge into anything, especially a fluid; sink; dip.

More than a mile immersed within the wood. Dryden, Theodore and Honoria, l. 89.

These the Moldaw's raging flood Swept with their wattled cotes, as o'er its banks
It rose redundant, swol'n with beating rains,
And deep immers'd beneath its whirling wave.
Warton, Eclogues, i.

He, . . . immers'd
Deep in the flood, found, when he sought it not,
The death he had deserv'd. Cowper, Task, vi. 554.

2. Specifically, to baptize by immersion.—3. Figuratively, to plunge into, as a state, occupation, interest, etc.; involve deeply: as, to immerse one's self in business.

When I see a person wholly immersed in affairs of the World, or spending his time in luxury and vanity, can I possibly think that man hath any esteem of God or of his own Soul? Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. v.

He who is immersed in what concerns person or place cannot see the problem of existence. Emerson, Intellect.

The Queen, immersed in such a trance, . . .
Came to that point where first she saw the King
Ride toward her from the city.
Tennyson, Guinevere.

immerset (i-mėrs'), a. [= Pg. It. immerso, < L. immersus, pp.: see the verb.] Immersed; buried; covered; deeply sunk.

And besides, I practise as I do advise: which is, after long inquiry of things immerse in matter, to interpose some subject which is immateriate, or less materiate. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 115.

immersed (i-mėrst'), p. a. 1. Deeply plunged into a fluid, or, figuratively, into some state, occupation, etc.—2. In bot.: (a) Growing wholly under water, as aquatic plants. (b) Originating beneath the surface of the matrix, or beneath the soil. In mosses the capsule is said to be immersed when covered over and concealed by the leaves of the perichætium. The fructification of lichens is immersed when sunk or plunged into the thallus.
3. In entom., said of a part which is somewhat or wholly sunken in another part, as the head when it is covered by the prothorax.—Immersed eyes, eyes which are not raised above the surface of the surrounding integument, appearing partly covered by it, as in certain beetles, etc.

immersible (i-mėr'si-bl), a. [< immerse + ★-ible.] Capable of being immersed.

immersion (i-mėr'shọn), n. [= F. immersion, < LL. immersio(n-), inmersio(n-), < L. immergere, inmergere, pp. immersus, inmersus, dip or plunge into: see immerse, immerge.] 1. The act of immersing, or the state of being immersed; a sinking or dipping into a fluid.

The Monitor, with only twelve feet immersion, could take any position. The Century, XXIX. 744.

Specifically—2. A mode of administering baptism by dipping or plunging the whole person into water.

In baptism we are sunk under water, and then raised above the water again: which was the manner of baptising in the Christian church, by immersion, and not by aspersion, till of late times. Donne, Sermons, xxix.

3. Figuratively, the act of overwhelming, or the state of being deeply engaged; absorption: as, immersion in scientific studies.

Too deep an immersion in the affairs of life. Atterbury.

4. In astron., the disappearance of a celestial body by passing either behind another or into its shadow: opposed to emersion. The occultation of a star is immersion of the first kind; the eclipse of a satellite, immersion of the second kind. Also called incidence.
5. In microscopy, the placing of a drop of liquid, such as water, between the object-glass and the object. The rays of light thus pass into the objective from a denser medium than the air which is otherwise present, and there is consequently less loss of light at the two reflecting surfaces; such an objective (immersion-objective or immersion-lens) has the advantage of greater working distance than a "dry objective." If instead of water a liquid having the same refractive and dispersive powers as the glass is employed, the method is called homogeneous immersion.
6. In ceram., the application of the glaze to a piece of pottery by plunging it into a vessel filled with the glaze in a liquid state.—Immersion gilding. See gilding.

immersionist (i-mėr'shọn-ist), n. [< immersion + -ist.] One who holds that immersion is essential to Christian baptism. See Baptist, 2.

Immersores (im-ėr-sō'rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of immersor, dipper, < L. immersus, pp. of immergere: see immerse.] In Macgillivray's system, an artificial order of birds which dive, as the water-ouzels and kingfishers. [Not in use.]

immesh (im-mesh'), v. t. [< *in-*2 + mesh. Cf. enmesh.] To involve in or as in the meshes of a net; entangle; enmesh. Also inmesh.

immigrant (im'i-grant), a. and n. [= F. immigrant = Sp. inmigrante = Pg. immigrante, < L. immigran(t-)s, ppr. of immigrare, remove into: see immigrate.] I. a. Immigrating; having immigrated.

Our first colonial period . . . transmits to us a body of writings produced by immigrant Americans.
M. C. Tyler, Hist. Amer. Lit., II. 7.

As to the origin of these immigrant cells, it may be regarded as certain that they have passed inwards from the epithelium. E. A. Schäfer, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 90.

II. n. One who or that which immigrates, as a person, an animal, or a plant; specifically, a person who migrates into a country for the purpose of permanent residence: correlative to emigrant, as strictly used.

It is to the age of Burke, and of his fellow liberalists who came just after him, that we are beholden for the word immigrant. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 283.

It has become more and more the habit of the richer class in Ireland to go to England for its enjoyment, and to feel itself socially rather English than Irish. Thus the chasm between the immigrants and the aborigines has grown deeper. J. Bryce, New Princeton Rev., III. 54.

immigrate (im'i-grāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. immigrated, ppr. immigrating. [< L. immigratus, pp. of immigrare, inmigrare (> Sp. inmigrar = F. immigrer), remove into, < in, in, + migrare, remove: see migrate. Cf. emigrate.] To pass or come into, as a new habitat or place of residence; especially, to remove into a country of which one is not a native for the purpose of permanent residence; migrate or be conveyed into and settle in another country or region.

The carrying of fatty particles into the lacteals after a meal containing fat by the immigrating leucocytes.
E. A. Schäfer, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 89.

=Syn. Emigrate, etc. See migrate.

immigration (im-i-grā'shọn), n. [= F. immigration = Sp. inmigración = Pg. immigração, < L. as if immigratio(n-)*, < immigrare, inmigrare, pp. immigratus, inmigratus, remove into: see immigrate.] The act of immigrating; the act or process of passing or removing into a country for the purpose of permanent residence.

The immigrations of the Arabians into Europe.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, I. 101.

Not modest as regards one's pretension or assertions; forward; arrogant.

For a man to deny that ever such things happened . . . is so immodest a thing as any sober man would be ashamed of. Bp. Wilkins, Natural Religion, i. 7.

I am not immodest enough to assume to speak for other readers, but for my own part I have become rather tired of African travellers. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Pesth, p. 197.

2. Not modest in conduct, utterance, or significance; wanting delicacy or propriety; especially, showing lewdness of thought or feeling; indelicate; indecent.

To gain the language,
'Tis needful that the most immodest word
Be look'd upon and learn'd.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4.

Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense.
Roscommon, Translated Verse, l. 113.

immodestly (i-mod'est-li), adv. In an immodest manner.

immodesty (i-mod'es-ti), n. [= F. immodestie = Sp. inmodestia = Pg. It. immodestia, < L. immodestia, inmodestia, unrestrained conduct, immodesty, < immodestus, inmodestus, immodest: see immodest.] Want of modesty. (a) Forwardness; arrogance or want of proper reserve.

[< L. immolatus, inmolatus, pp. of immolare, inmolare (> It. immolare = Pg. immolar = Sp. inmolar = F. immoler), sacrifice, orig. sprinkle (the victim) with sacrificial meal (meal mixed with salt), < in, on, + mola, meal mixed with salt, grits, also a mill: see mill[1], mole[4].] To kill as a sacrificial victim; offer in sacrifice; make a sacrifice of.

Barbarous worshippers, who not only immolate to them [their deities] the lives of men but . . . the virtue and honour of women. Boyle, Works, V. 262.

The ministers . . . had offered to immolate at the same shrine the most valuable of the national acquisitions.
Burke, A Regicide Peace, iii.

In Peru, where there were habitual human sacrifices, men taken captive were immolated to the father of the Yncas, the Sun. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 259.

★=Syn. See sacrifice, v.

immolation (im-ọ̄-lā'shọn), n. [= F. immolation = Sp. inmolación = Pg. immolação = It. immolazione, < L. immolatio(n-), inmolatio(n-), < immolare, inmolare, sacrifice: see immolate.] 1. The act of immolating, or the state of being immolated.

In the picture of the immolation of Isaac, or Abraham sacrificing his son, Isaac is described as a little boy.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 8.

Oh, if our ends were less achievable
By slow approaches than by single act
Of immolation, any phase of death,
We were as prompt to spring against the pikes,
Or down the fiery gulf, as talk of it.
Tennyson, Princess, iii.

2. A sacrificial offering; a sacrifice.

We make more barbarous immolations than the most savage heathens. Decay of Christian Piety.

immolator (im'ọ̄-lā-tọr), n. [= F. immolateur = Sp. inmolador = Pg. immolador = It. immolatore, < L. immolator, inmolator, < immolare, inmolare, sacrifice: see immolate.] One who immolates or offers in sacrifice.

immoment† (i-mō'mẹnt), a. [< in-^{3} + moment, taken as equiv. to momentous.] Trifling.

A flatterer of vice is an immoral man. Johnson.

Give up money, . . . give the earth itself and all it contains, rather than do an immoral act.
Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 285.

Morality is deeply interested in this, that what is immoral shall not be presented to the imagination of the young and susceptible in constant connection with what is attractive. Macaulay, Comic Dramatists.

2. Contrary to good order or public welfare; inimical to the rights or common interests of others: a legal and commercial sense.

He [a political leader] would be less immoral, even though he were as lax in his personal habits as Sir Robert Walpole, if at the same time his sense of the public welfare were supreme in his mind.
George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.

When we call a thing immoral in a legal sense, we do not mean so much that it is ethically wrong as that, according to the common understanding of reasonable men, it would be a scandal for a court of justice to treat it as lawful or indifferent, though the transaction may not come within any positive prohibition or penalty.
Quoted in Rapalje and Lawrence's Law Dict., I. 627, note.

=Syn. Illegal, Wicked, etc. See criminal.

immorality (im-ọ̄-ral'i-ti), n.; pl. immoralities (-tiz). [= F. immoralité = Sp. inmoralidad = Pg. immoralidade = It. immoralità, < ML. immoralita(t-)s*, immorality, < immoralis*, immoral: see immoral.] 1. The character of being immoral; transgression of the moral law; immoral thought or action; wickedness; dissoluteness; licentiousness.

A restlessness in men's minds to be something they are not, and have something they have not, is the root of all immorality. Sir W. Temple, Life and Fortune.

2. An immoral act or practice.

Luxury and sloth, and then a great drove of heresies and immoralities, broke loose among them.
Milton, Def. of the People of England.

I have Immortal longings in me.
Shak., A. and C., v. 2.

Lap me in soft Lydian airs,
Married to immortal verse.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 137.

That breast imbued with such immortal fire.
Byron, Childe Harold, ii. 39.

3†. Perpetual; unchanging.

This I was glad of, and so were all the rest of us, though I know I have made myself an immortal enemy by it.
Pepys, Diary, Jan. 29, 1668.

=Syn. Perpetual, Everlasting, etc. (see eternal); incorruptible, deathless, enduring, unfading.

II. n. 1. One who is immortal, or exempt from death or annihilation.—2. One of the gods of classical mythology: usually in the plural.

Never, believe me,
Appear the Immortals,
Never alone.
Coleridge, Visit of the Gods (Imit. of Schiller).

The Forty Immortals, the members of the French Academy: an affected designation, alluding to the perpetuity of their number and succession, and to their supposed enduring fame in their several departments of literature.—The immortals. (a) The classical divinities. See def. 2, above. (b) The name of the royal guard of ancient Persia, the members of which were magnificently equipped and numerously attended.

immortalisation, immortalise. See immortalization, immortalize.

immortalist (i-môr'tal-ist), n. [< immortal + -ist.] One who holds that the soul is immortal.

This learning they had from the inhabitants by Ister, who were called Immortalists, because in the midst of all their dark notions of things they saw this clearly, that virtuous and good men do not die, but their souls do go into blessed regions.
Jer. Taylor, Funeral Sermons, 392. (Latham.)

immortality (im-ôr-tal'i-ti), n. [= F. immortalité = Sp. inmortalidad = Pg. immortalidade = It. immortalità, < L. immortalita(t-)s, inmortalita(t-)s, undyingness, < immortalis, inmortalis, undying: see immortal.] 1. The condition or quality of being immortal; exemption from death or annihilation; unending existence.

Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.
2 Tim. i. 10.

After many a summer dies the swan.
Me only cruel immortality
Consumes. Tennyson, Tithonus.

We have strongly within us the sense of an undying principle, and we transfer that true sense to this life and to the body, instead of interpreting it justly as the promise of spiritual immortality.
Hawthorne, Septimius Felton, p. 14.

2. Exemption from oblivion; perpetuity: as, the immortality of fame.

I held it ever,
Virtue and cunning were endowments greater Than nobleness and riches: . . .
. . . Immortality attends the former,
Making a man a god. Shak., Pericles, iii. 2.

Thoughts whose very sweetness yieldeth proof
That they were born for immortality.
Wordsworth, Eccles. Sonnets, iii. 43.

Conditional immortality, in theol. See conditional.

immortalization (i-môr″tal-i-zā′shon), n. [< immortalize + -ation.] The act of immortalizing, or the state of being immortalized. Also spelled immortalisation.

Drive them from Orleans, and be immortalis'd.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 2.

Sometimes, misguided by the tuneful throng,
I look for streams immortalized in song,
That lost in silence and oblivion lie.
Addison, Letter from Italy.

Blest be the Art that can immortalize,
The Art that baffles Time's tyrannic claim To quench it. Cowper, My Mother's Picture.

II. intrans. To become immortal. [Rare.]

Fix the years precise
When British bards began to immortalise.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 54.

Also spelled immortalise.

immortally (i-môr′tal-i), adv. 1. In an immortal manner; eternally; with exemption from death or from oblivion.

There is your crown:
And He that wears the crown immortally
Long guard it yours! Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4.

Therefore she is immortally my bride;
Chance cannot change that love, nor time impair.
Browning, Any Wife to any Husband.

2†. Exceedingly: as, "immortally glad," Rev. R. Burton.

immortelle (im-ôr-tel′), n. [F., fem. of immortel, undying: see immortal.] Any one of the flowers commonly called everlasting, or a wreath made of such flowers. From their papery texture, these flowers retain their natural color and appearance after drying, and are therefore much used for wreaths for graves, or dyed of other colors for ornamental purposes. See everlasting, n., 3.

Alas for love, alas for fleeting breath—
Immortelles bloom with Beauty's bridal roses.
Locker, A Human Skull.

immortification† (i-môr″ti-fi-kā′shon), n. [= F. immortification = Sp. inmortificación = Pg. immortificação = It. immortificazione; as in-[3] + mortification.] Want of mortification or subjection of the passions.

immound†, v. t. [< in-[1] + mound.] To inclose within mounds or high banks; dam up.

The siluer fronted Star . . .
Pours with less pow'r her plentious influence
Vpon these straight and narrow streamed Fennes
And In-land Seas, which many a Mount immounds,
Then on an Ocean vast and void of bounds.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

immovability (i-mö-va-bil′i-ti), n. [< immovable: see -bility.] The condition or quality of being immovable; steadfastness.

immovable (i-mö′va-bl), a. and n. [= OF. immovable, immouvable, F. immouvable = Sp. inmovible; as in-[3] + movable. Cf. immobile.] I. a. 1. Incapable of being moved or displaced; too heavy or firm to be moved; firmly fixed; fast.

Population, we see, produces a sward of grass round ancient cities in the most desert parts of Africa, which keeps the sand immoveable till the place is no longer inhabited.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 11.

Immovable, infix'd, and frozen round.
Milton, P. L., ii. 602.

2. Not to be moved from a purpose; steadfast; fixed; that cannot be induced to change or alter: as, a man who remains immovable.

Mr. Jorkins has his opinion on these points. . . . Mr. Jorkins is immovable. Dickens, David Copperfield, xxiii.

3. Incapable of being altered or shaken; unalterable; unchangeable: as, an immovable purpose or resolution.—4. That cannot be affected; not impressible; impassive; unfeeling.

How much happier is he who . . . remains immovable and smiles at the madness of the dance about him?
Dryden, Don Sebastian.

5. In law, not liable to be removed; permanent in place; real, as distinguished from personal.

There are things immovable by their nature, others by their destination, and others by the objects to which they are applied. Bouvier.

Immovable feast. See feast[1]. =Syn. Firm, stable, unshaken, rooted, resolute.

II. n. That which cannot be moved; specifically, in law, land, or any appurtenance fixed to or running with the land. Immovables are things that are stationary by nature, as land and trees, or are so made by the hand of man, as buildings and their accessories, or by the objects to which they apply, as servitudes.

Also immoveable.

immovableness (i-mö′va-bl-nes), n. The quality of being immovable.

immovably (i-mö′va-bli), adv. In an immovable manner; so as not to be moved or altered; unalterably; unchangeably.

Whosoever will enter into a course of purging his nature of that humour . . . shall recover the right savour and gust of purity by the same degree he is cleansed from the other immundicity.
W. Montague, Devoute Essays, I. xii. § 3.

★ immune (i-mūn′), a. and n. [= OF. immun, immune = Sp. inmune = Pg. It. immune, < L. immunis, inmunis, exempt from public service or charges, free, exempt, < in- priv. + munis, serving, munus, service, duty, charge; cf. common, commune[1].] I. a. Exempt; specifically, protected by inoculation: as, an immune animal.

II. n. One who is exempt; specifically, one who is protected from a particular disease by inoculation or by a previous attack.

★ immunity (i-mū′ni-ti), n.; pl. immunities (-tiz). [= F. immunité = Pr. immunitat = Sp. inmunidad = Pg. immunidade = It. immunità, < L. immunita(t-)s, inmunita(t-)s, exemption from public service or charges, < immunis, exempt from public service or charges: see immune.] 1. Exemption from obligation or responsibility in any respect, conferred by law or a sovereign act; freedom from legal liability; an exemption conferred, as from public service or charges, or from penalty for any particular act or course of conduct; hence, special privilege; liberty to do or refrain from doing any particular thing.

The old Hans had extraordinary Immunities given them by our Henry III. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 3.

When they could hope in nothing but their innocence, immunity was offered them again if they would confess.
D. Webster.

Claims restitution of the dowry paid,
Immunity from paying any more.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 191.

2. Exemption from any natural or usual liability.

But man is frail, and can but ill sustain
A long immunity from grief and pain.
Cowper, Expostulation, l. 82.

Do men desire the more substantial and permanent grandeur of genius? Neither has this an immunity. He who by force of will or of thought is great, and overlooks thousands, has the charges of that eminence.
Emerson, Compensation.

3. In eccles. usage, the exemption of certain sacred places and ecclesiastical personages from secular burdens and functions, and from acts regarded as repugnant to their sanctity. This immunity is of three kinds: (1) local, giving to the sacred place the character of a refuge or asylum to any one fleeing to its protection (see sanctuary); (2) real, exempting the property of the church and the clergy from secular jurisdiction and taxation; (3) personal, exempting the clergy themselves from the civil duties incumbent on other citizens and from lay jurisdiction. These ecclesiastical immunities, once very numerous, are now very much restricted.

4. See the quotation.

I have hitherto described the association of freemen whose rank was equal, or but slightly different, and who lived together upon terms of equality. Outside this association there were two other forms of society. There was the Household, considered as a corporate body, without any relation to other Households. There were the relations of the Household to its inferiors arising from their common subordination. The independent position of the Household may be called Immunity, as opposed to the Community. W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 232.

★ Congregation of Immunities. See congregation, 6 (a).

immure (i-mūr′), v. t.; pret. and pp. immured, ppr. immuring. [Formerly also enmure; < OF. emmurrer = Pr. enmurar, emurar, < ML. immurare, shut within walls, < L. in, in, + murus, a wall: see mural, mure.] 1†. To surround with walls; wall; fortify; protect.

Alexander dying, Lysimachus . . . immured it [the city] with a wall. Sandys, Travailes, p. 18.

Such things which were great instruments of public ends, and things of highest use, were also, in all societies of men, of greatest honour, and immured by reverence and the security of laws. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 155.

2. To inclose within walls; hence, to shut up or confine, in general.

I mean, setting thee at liberty, enfreedoming thy person; thou wert immured, restrained, captivated, bound.

Immured
In the hot prison of the present.
M. Arnold, Growing Old.

immure† (i-mūr′), n. [< immure, v.] An inclosure; a wall.

Troy, within whose strong immures
The ravish'd Helen, Menelaus' queen, With wanton Paris sleeps. Shak., T. and C., Prol.

immurement (i-mūr′ment), n. [< immure + -ment.] The act of immuring, or the state of being immured; imprisonment.

Our peregrinations made it very clear that Carcassonne was impregnable; it is impossible to imagine, without having seen them, such refinements of immurement, such ingenuities of resistance. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 151.

=Syn. Incarceration, etc. See captivity.

immusical†, a. [< in-[3] + musical. Cf. LL. immusicus, inmusicus, unmusical.] Unmusical.

All sounds are either musical sounds, which we call tones, . . . which sounds are ever equal: or immusical sounds, which are ever unequal. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 101.

immutability (i-mū-ta-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. immutabilité = Sp. inmutabilidad = Pg. immutabilidade = It. immutabilità, < L. immutabilita(t-)s, inmutabilita(t-)s, unchangeableness, < immutabilis, inmutabilis, unchangeable: see immutable.] The quality of being immutable; immutableness; unchangeableness; invariableness.

God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath. Heb. vi. 17.

immutation† (im-ū-tā′shon), n. [= OF. immutation = Sp. inmutación = It. immutazione, < L. immutatio(n-), inmutatio(n-), < immutare, inmutare, change: see immute.] Change; transformation; substitution of one thing for another.

Some euident defect, or surplusage, or disorder, or immutation in the same speaches notably altering either the congruitie grammaticall, or the sence, or both.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 136.

Lo, what delightful immutations
On her soft flowing vest we contemplate!
Dr. H. More, Psychathanasia, I. i. 23.

Natural immutation† is where the form of that which brings about the change is received in the thing that undergoes the change as it existed in the former, as where one body heats another.—Spiritual immutation† is where the form of the first thing is received in the second in esse spirituale. Thus, when a colored object affects the eye the latter does not become colored.

immute† (i-mūt′), v. t. [= OF. immuer, inmuer = Sp. inmutar = Pg. immutar = It. immutare, < L. immutare, inmutare, change into something else, < in, in, + mutare, change: see mute[2]. Cf. commute.] To change into another form; transform.

God can immediately immute, change, corrupt . . . whatsoever pleaseth his divine majesty.
Salkeld, Treatise of Angels, p. 106.

Although the substance of gold be not immuted, or its gravity sensibly decreased, yet that from thence some vertue may proceed . . . we cannot safely deny.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

imou-pine (im′ö-pīn), n. A valuable New Zealand tree, Dacrydium cupressinum. The trunk attains a height of 80 feet and a thickness of from 4 to 5 feet. ★The wood is red, solid, and heavy. Also called rimu.

Without any impeachment of the prosperous operation of our system, prejudices may arise between the different sections of the country, etc. Everett, Orations, I. 201.

3. A calling to account; arraignment; the act of charging with a crime or misdemeanor; specifically, the exhibition of charges of maladministration against a high public officer before a competent tribunal. In the United States, the House of Representatives has the sole power of impeachment of the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States; the Senate has the sole power to try all impeachments, the Chief Justice presiding at the trial of a President; and a two-thirds vote is necessary for conviction. In the case of State officers, there is generally a similar division of functions between the upper and the lower branch of the legislature. In the history of the federal government there have been seven cases of impeachment, the most famous being that of President Johnson in 1868. In only two cases, both of district judges, was a verdict of guilty given. In Great Britain, impeachments are made in the House of Commons and tried by the House of Lords. Prominent impeachments in English history were those of Lord Bacon and Warren Hastings.

The practice of impeachment directed against Michael de la Pole in 1386 was revived in 1450 for the destruction of his grandson. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 371.

Articles of impeachment. See article.—Court of impeachment, a tribunal, usually the upper branch of a legislature, sitting on the trial of articles of impeachment.—Impeachment of a witness. See impeach, v. t.—Impeachment of waste, in law, a restraint from committing waste upon lands or tenements, or a demand of recompense for waste, done by a tenant to the prejudice of the right of another's estate or interest in the property.

impermeable (im-pėr′mē-a̤-bl), a. [= F. imperméable = Sp. impermeable = Pg. impermeavel = It. impermeabile; as in-[3] + permeable.] Not permeable; not permitting the passage of a fluid (especially water) through its substance.

The sandy soil of the Landes of Gascony is malarious. At a depth of about three feet is an impermeable stratum, brown in color and strong in structure, known as the alios. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 621.

impermeableness (im-pėr′mē-a̤-bl-nes), n. The state of being impermeable.

impermeably (im-pėr′mē-a̤-bli), adv. In an impermeable manner.

impermeator (im-pėr′mē-ā-tor), n. [< L. in, in, + LL. permeator, one who passes through: see permeator.] In a steam-engine, an instrument or device for forcing oil uniformly into the cylinder for lubricating the walls of the cylinder and the piston. This term has been recently adopted to distinguish this class of lubricators from those which supply oil through a wick or by the action of gravity. Impermeators are constructed on various principles. Condensed water accumulating in a reservoir from steam admitted through a small pipe, and uniformly displacing oil from the reservoir, and causing it to flow through a duct into the cylinder, has been successfully used.—Mechanical impermeator, a combined receptacle and force-pump, the action of which uniformly supplies oil to the cylinder of a steam-engine. The gearing of one form of impermeator consists of a ratchet-lever worked from the nearest valve-rod, which operates a nut fitted to a screw on a plunger, thus moving the plunger a definite distance, and forcing into the cylinder a specific quantity of oil at each revolution of the crank-shaft.

impermissible (im-pėr-mis′i-bl), a. [< in-[3] + permissible.] Not permissible; not to be permitted or allowed. [Rare.]

imperscrutable (im-pėr-skrö′ta̤-bl), a. [= F. imperscrutable = Sp. imperscrutable = It. imperscrutabile; as in-[3] + perscrutable.] Not capable of being searched out.

imperscrutableness (im-pėr-skrö′ta̤-bl-nes), n. The state of not being capable of scrutiny.

imperseverant† (im-pėr-se-vēr′ant), a. [< in- + perseverant.] 1. Unpersevering.—2. An old spelling of imperceiverant, unperceiving.

Beyond him in the advantage of the time, above him in birth, alike conversant in general services, and more remarkable in single oppositions; yet this imperseverant thing loves him in my despite.
Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 1.

impersistent (im-pėr-sis′tent), a. [< in-[3] + persistent.] Not persistent or enduring.

The unconformity in this case is, however, indicated . . . by the occurrence at the line of junction of an eroded and impersistent bed of hard, fine-grained, Coal-measure sandstone ("cank"). Geol. Jour., XLV. i. 7.

impersonal (im-pėr′son-a̤l), a. and n. [= F. impersonnel = Pr. Sp. impersonal = Pg. impessoal = It. impersonale, < NL. impersonalis, < L. in- priv. + personalis, personal: see personal.] I. a. Not personal. (a) Not existing or manifested as a person; having no conscious individuality; not endued with personality.

Impersonall, . . . L. Impersonalis. Minsheu, 1617.

Dark creed, and mournful eastern dream
Of power, impersonal and cold.
Whittier, Questions of Life.

Routine work was credited to the assistants in charge, and not to the impersonal office. Science, IX. 334.

(b) Not relating to a person, or to any particular person or persons; having no personal reference; not bearing the stamp of any particular personality: as, an impersonal remark.

Even love, which is the deification of persons, must become more impersonal every day. Emerson.

What I long for is knowledge—some other knowledge than comes to us in formal, colorless, impersonal precept.
H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 200.

(c) In gram., said of a verb not used with a personal subject, or employed to express action without specification of an actor, and hence used only in the third person, and either without a subject expressed, or with only the indefinite it (French il, German es, etc.): thus, Latin me tædet, French il m'ennuie, German es ärgert mich, it irks me; or German mich dünkt, methinks—that is, (to) me (it) seems (methinks is nearly the sole relic left in English of the pure impersonal construction without subject); or it rains—that is, rain is going on; or Latin pugnatur, it is fought—that is, fighting is going on. In many quasi-impersonal phrases the it is a grammatical subject, anticipating a logical subject that comes later: thus, it hurts one to fall—that is, falling hurts one; and so on.

Wher note that verbes impersonalles be oftentimes turned into personalles. Udall, Flowres, fol. 11.

II. n. That which wants personality; an impersonal verb.

Impersonals be declined throughout all moods and tenses; a verb impersonal hath no nominative case before him. Johnson, Eng. Gram., Accidence.

impersonality (im-pėr-so-nal′i-ti), n. [= F. impersonnalité = Sp. impersonalidad = Pg. im- pessoalidade; as impersonal + -ity.] The character or condition of being impersonal; absence of personality.

Junius is pleased to tell me that he addresses himself to me personally. I shall be glad to see him. It is his impersonality that I complain of.
Draper, Letters of Junius, iv.

impersonally (im-pėr'son-al-i), adv. In an impersonal manner; without individual agency or relation.

It will be well to indicate the kind of law which originates impersonally from the prevailing sentiments and ideas. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 533.

impey (im′pi), n. Same as impeyan.

impeyan (im′pi-an), n. [Short for Impeyan pheasant.] Same as Impeyan pheasant.

Impeyan pheasant (im′pi-an fez′ant). A kind of East Indian pheasant, a variety of monaul: so called by Latham, in 1787, after Sir Elijah Impey, or his wife Lady Impey, who tried to bring living examples of this pheasant to England. Lady Impey's pheasant was at first classed as Phasianus impeyanus or impeianus; but it is now known as Lophophorus impeyanus, and the name is extended to some other species of the restricted genus Lophophorus or Impeyanus. The head is crested, and the plumage of the male is of the most brilliant, changing, metallic hues—green, steel-blue, violet, and golden bronze. The female and young are brown, mottled with gray and yellow. The bird is capable of domestication. Its Nepalese name monaul signifies 'bird of gold.' These fine birds inhabit the colder or more elevated regions of India and countries adjoining on the north.

Impeyan Pheasant (Lophophorus impeyanus).

Impeyanus (im-pi-ā′nus), n. [NL.] A genus of Phasianidæ, containing the Impeyan pheasants or monauls: now called Lophophorus. R. P. Lesson, 1831.

He feeds those secret and impiercing flames, Nurs'd in fresh youth, and gotten in desires.
Drayton, Moses, l.

impierceable† (im-pēr′sa-bl), a. [< in-3 + pierceable.] Not pierceable; incapable of being pierced.

For never felt his imperceable brest
So wondrous force from hand of living wight.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 17.

Your weapons and armour are spirituall, therefore irresistable, therefore impierceable.
N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 76.

impierment†, n. An obsolete variant of impairment. Bailey.

impiety (im pī′e-ti), n.; pl. impieties (-tiz). [= F. impiété = Pr. impietat = Sp. impiedad = Pg. impiedade = It. impietà, < L. impietа(t-)s, inpieta(t-)s, impiousness, < impius, inpius, impious: see impious.] 1. The condition or quality of being impious or devoid of piety; irreverence toward the Supreme Being; ungodliness; wickedness.

The succeeding prosperities of fortunate impiety, when they meet with punishment in the next, or in the third age, or in the deletion of a people five ages after, are the greatest arguments of God's providence, who keeps wrath in store. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 76.

2. An impious act; an act of wickedness or irreligion.

Then, if they die unprovided, no more is the king guilty of their damnation than he was before guilty of those impieties for the which they are now visited.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1.

3. Violation of natural duty or obligation toward others; want of reverence or respect, in general; undutifulness, as toward parents: as, filial impiety.

Than Jephtha's, when he sacrificed his daughter.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 1.

impignorate (im-pig′nō-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. impignorated, ppr. impignorating. [< ML. impignoratus, impigneratus, pp. of impignorare, impignerare, put in pledge, pledge, < L. in, in, + pigneratus, ML. also pignoratus, pp. of pignerare, ML. also pignorare, pledge, < pignus (pignor-, pigner-), a pledge: see pignoration.] To pledge or pawn. [Rare.]

On September 8, 1468, the sovereignty of Orkney and Shetland was temporarily pledged (impignorated) to the Crown of Scotland in security for part of the dowry of the Princess Margaret of Denmark and Norway, at that time betrothed to King James III. Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 685.

impignoration (im-pig-nō-rā′shon), n. [< ML. impignoratio(n-), a pledging, < impignorare, pledge: see impignorate.] The act of pawning or pledging; transfer of possession or dominion as security for the performance of an obligation.

All arrestments, reprisals, and impignorations of whatsoever goods and marchandises in England and Prussia, made before the date of these presents, are from henceforth quiet, free, and released. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 151.

His [the parent's] right of sale . . . was restricted to young children, and permitted only when he was in great poverty and unable to maintain them, while their impignoration by him was prohibited under pain of banishment. Encyc. Brit., XX. 706.

imping (im′ping), n. [< ME. impynge; verbal n. of imp, v.] 1. A graft; something added to a thing to extend or repair it.—2. In falconry, the operation or method of mending broken feathers.

impinge (im-pinj′), v. i.; pret. and pp. impinged, ppr. impinging. [< L. impingere, inpingere (> It. impingere, impignere = Pg impingir), pp. impactus, inpactus, push, drive, or strike at, into, or upon, < in, in, on, + pingere, strike: see pact. Cf. impact.] To come in collision; collide; strike or dash: followed by on, upon, or against.

A ship that is void of a pilot, must needs impinge upon the next rock or sands. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 265.

When light comes out of a vacuum and impinges upon any transparent medium, say upon glass, we find that the rate of transmission of all the light is diminished.
W. K. Clifford, First and Last Catastrophe.

impingement (im-pinj′ment), n. [< impinge + -ment.] The act of impinging.

impingent (im-pin′jent), a. [< L. impingen(t-)s, inpingen(t-)s, ppr. of impingere, inpingere, impinge: see impinge.] Falling or striking against or upon something; impinging.

imping-needle (im′ping-nē″dl), n. In falconry, a piece of tough, soft iron wire about two inches long, tapering from the middle to the ends, and rough-filed so as to be three-sided, used to mend a hawk's broken wing-feather Encyc. Brit., IX. 70.

impinguate† (im-ping′gwāt), v. t. [< L. impinguatus, inpinguatus, pp. of impinguare, inpinguare (> It. impinguare = Sp. impingar), make fat, become fat, < in, in, + pinguis, fat: see pinguid.] To fatten; make fat.

Frictions also do more fill and impinguate the body than exercise. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 877.

impinguation† (im-ping-gwā′shon), n. [= It. impinguazione; as impinguate + -ion.] The act of making or the process of becoming fat.

impious (im′pi-us), a. [= F. impie = Sp. impio = Pg. It. impio, < L. impius, inpius, irreverent, undutiful, ungodly, < in- priv. + pius, reverent, dutiful, godly: see pious.] 1. Not pious; lacking piety or reverence for God; irreligious; profane; wicked.

An impious, arrogant, and cruel brood;
Expressing their original from blood.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i. 208.

The impious challenger of Pow'r divine
Was now to learn that Heav'n, though slow to wrath,
Is never with impunity defied. Cowper, Task, vi. 546.

2. Characterized by want of piety; of an irreverent or wicked character: as, an impious deed; impious writings.

Save me alike from foolish pride
Or impious discontent. Pope, Universal Prayer.

The war which Truth or Freedom wages
With impious fraud and the wrong of ages.
Whittier, The Preacher.

=Syn. Unrighteous, Profane, etc. See irreligious.

impiously (im'pi-us-li), adv. In an impious manner; profanely; wickedly.

There is most ordinarily much severity, and persecution, and implacableness and irreconcileableness.
Sir M. Hale, Discourse of Religion.

implacably (im-plā'ka-bli), adv. In an implacable manner or degree; with resentment not to be appeased or overcome.

No kind of people are observed to be more implacably and destructively envious to one another than these.
Bacon, Political Fables, x., Expl.

implacement (im-plās'ment), n. Same as emplacement.

We understand that the heavy steel guns are to be mounted in Moncrieff implacements.
The Engineer, LXVII. 281.

implacental (im-plā-sen'tal), a. and n. [< NL. implacentalis, < L. in- priv. + NL. placenta.] I. a. Having no placenta; not placental; specifically, pertaining to the Implacentalia or having their characters. Also implacentate.

II. n. An implacental mammal, as a marsupial or a monotreme.

Implacentalia (im"plā-sen-tā'li-ą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of implacentalis: see implacental.] A group of mammalia constituted by the marsupials and monotremes, representing the subclasses Didelphia and Ornithodelphia, as together contrasted with the Placentalia or Monodelphia. Though the marsupials and monotremes agree with each other and differ from other mammals in some features, as the absence of a placenta, in many important respects they differ from each other as much as they do from other mammals collectively. The term Implacentalia, therefore, has no exact classificatory significance, being now only a convenient collective term for those mammals which are devoid of a placenta. Also Implacentata, Aplacentalia, Aplacentaria.

Implacentata (im"plā-sen-tā'tą), n. pl. Same as Implacentalia. Sir R. Owen.

implacentate (im-plā-sen'tāt), a. [< NL. implacentatus, < L. in- priv. + NL. placenta.] Same as implacental.

implaint†, v. t. [ME. implaynen, < L. in- + planare, make plane: see plane, plain.] To plaster.

Oyldregges mixt with clay thou must implayne
Thi wowes with, and leves of olyve,
In stede of chaf upon thi wowes dryve.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 18.

implant (im-plant'), v. t. [= F. implanter, OF. emplanter = Pg. implantar = It. impiantare, < ML. implantare, lit. plant in (found in sense of 'install, invest'), < L. in, in, + plantare, plant: see plant, v.] 1. To plant, set, fix, or lodge; cause to take root or form a vital union: with in: as, to implant living tissue from one part of the body in another; to implant sound principles in the mind.

Nature has implanted fear in all living creatures.
Bacon, Fable of Pan.

Another cartilage, capable of motion, by the help of some muscles that were implanted in it. Ray.

2†. To cause to be supplied or enriched; imbue or endow: with with.

Implant me with grace. Bp. Hall, The Resurrection.

Minds well implanted with solid and elaborate breeding. Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

Implanted crystals. See crystal. =Syn. 1. Implant, Ingraft, Inculcate, Instil, Infuse. Principles may be implanted in the mind in childhood, they are ingrafted on an existing stock later in life; they are inculcated (trodden in) by authority or by discipline, sometimes without taking root. Sentiments and gentler thoughts are instilled (dropping as the dew), or they are infused (poured in) by more vigorous effort. Infused sentiments are often more partial and less permanent than those that are instilled. (Angus, Hand-Book of Eng. Tongue, § 40.) Implant, ingraft, and inculcate denote most of vigorous effort; inculcate and instil most of protracted work; instil, and next to it infuse, most of subtlety or quietness on the part of the agent and unconsciousness on the part of the person acted upon. The first three words apply most often to opinions, beliefs, or principles; the last two to sentiments or feelings; but a sentiment or feeling may also be implanted.

implantation (im-plan-tā'shon), n. [= F. implantation = Pg. implantação; as implant + -ation.] The act of implanting, or the state of being implanted; the act of setting or fixing firmly in place.

Whose work could it be but his alone to make such provision for the direct implantation of his church?
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 8.

Their mode of implantation varies, but they [teeth] are not ankylosed to the jaws. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 265.

Articulation by implantation. Same as gomphosis.

implate (im-plāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. implated, ppr. implating. [< in-[3] + plate.] To cover or protect with plates; sheathe; plate: as, to implate a ship with iron. [Rare.]

implausible (im-plâ'zi-bl), a. [< in-[3] + plausible.] Not plausible; not having the appearance of truth or credibility; of dubious aspect.

Nothing can better improve political schoolboys than the art of making plausible or implausible harangues against the very opinion for which they resolve to determine. Swift.

implausibleness (im-plâ'zi-bl-nes), n. Implausibility.

implausibly (im-plâ'zi-bli), adv. In an implausible or dubious manner.

impleach† (im-plēch'), v. t. [< in-[2] + pleach.] To interweave.

These talents [lockets] of their hair,
With twisted metal amorously impleach'd.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 205.

implead (im-plēd'), v. t. [Formerly also empplead, emplete; < ME. empleden, empleten, < AF. empledier, enpledier, OF. emplaidier, enpleider, etc., plead, pursue at law, < en- + pledier, plaidier, etc., plead: see plead.] 1. To sue or prosecute by judicial proceedings: as, the corporation shall have power to plead and be impleaded.

The ordre of pledgynge that me pledeth in the Cytee of Wynchestre ys by swych a-vys, that euerych man of the fraunchyse that is empled may habbe thre resonable somounces to-fore shewynge 3if he hit habbe wele.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 360.

The barons of Poictou legally impleaded John for his treatment of the Count of la Marche.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 218.

2. To impeach; accuse.

Antiquity thought thunder the immediate voice of Jupiter, and impleaded them of impiety that referr'd it to naturall causalities. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xii.

We are not the only persons who have impleaded persecution, and justified Liberty of Conscience as Christian and rational. Penn, Liberty of Conscience, v.

impleadable† (im-plē'da-bl), a. [< in-[3] + pleadable.] Not to be pleaded against or evaded.

An impenetrable judge, an impleadable indictment, an intolerable anguish shall seize upon them.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 196.

impleader (im-plē'dėr), n. One who impleads or prosecutes another; an accuser; an impeacher.

Ye envious and deadly malicious, ye impleaders and action threateners, how long shall the Lord suffer you in His house in which dwelleth nothing but peace and charity! Harmar, tr. of Beza's Sermons (1587), p. 176.

impledge (im-plej'), v. t. [< in-[2] + pledge.] To pledge; pawn. Sherwood. [Rare.]

The Lower Lis
They to the utterance will dispute, for there
Their chief, who lacks not capability,
Will justly deem their all to be impledged.
Sir H. Taylor, Ph. van Artevelde, II., v. 2.

implement (im'plē-ment), n. [= OF. emplement = Pg. implemento, < LL. implementum, inplementum, a filling up, < L. implere, inplere, fill up: see implete. Cf. complement, explement, supplement.] 1. The act of fulfilling or performing: as, in implement of a contract. [Scotch.] —2. Whatever may supply a want; especially, an instrument, tool, or utensil; an instrumental appliance or means: as, the implements of trade or of husbandry.

Such implements of mischief as shall dash
To pieces and o'erwhelm whatever stands Adverse. Milton, P. L., vi. 488.

Speaks Miracles; is the Drum to his own Praise—the only implement of a Soldier he resembles, like that being full of blustering Noise and Emptiness.
Congreve, Old Batchelor, i. 5.

A golden bough, we see, was an important implement, and of very complicated intention in the shows of the mysteries. Warburton, Divine Legation, ii. 4.

Flint implements. See flint. =Syn. 2. Instrument, Utensil, etc. See tool.

implement (im'plē-ment), v. t. [< implement, n.] 1. To fulfil or satisfy the conditions of; accomplish.

It was the purpose of Mr. Calhoun . . . to implete the Government silently with Southern principles.
New York Independent, July 31, 1862.

impletion (im-plē'shon), n. [< LL. impletio(n-), inpletio(n-), < implere, inplere, pp. impletus, inpletus, fill up: see implete.] 1. The act of impleting or filling, or the state of being full.

He [Theophrastus] conceiveth . . . that upon a plentiful impletion there may perhaps succeed a disruption of the matrix. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 16.

The depletion of his [man's] natural pride and self-seeking in order to his subsequent spiritual impletion with all Divine gentleness, peace, and innocence.
H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 256.

2. That which fills up; filling. Coleridge.

implex (im'pleks), a. and n. [= F. implexe = Pg. implexo, < L. implexus, inplexus, pp. of implectere, inplectere, plait or twist in, entwine, interweave, entangle, < in, in, + plectere, weave, plait. Cf. complex.] I. a. Infolded; intricate; entangled; complicated. [Rare.]

The fable of every poem is, according to Aristotle's division, either simple or implex. It is called simple when there is no change of fortune in it; implex, when the fortune of the chief actor changes from bad to good, or from good to bad. Addison, Spectator, No. 297.

II. n. In math., a doubly infinite system of surfaces.

implexion (im-plek'shon), n. [< L. implexio(n-), inplexio(n-), an entwining, entangling, < implectere, inplectere, pp. implexus, inplexus, entwine, entangle: see implex.] The act of infolding or involving, or the state of being infolded or involved; involution. [Rare.]

implexous (im-plek'sus), a. [< L. implexus, inplexus, pp., entwined: see implex.] In bot., entangled; interlaced.

Confucianism is deeply implicated with it [ancestor-worship]. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 63.

We know that the brain is pathologically implicated in insanity. Alien. and Neurol., VIII. 633.

=Syn. Implicate, Involve, Entangle. Implicate and involve are similar words, but with a marked difference. The first means to fold into a thing; the second, to roll into it. What is folded, however, may be folded but once or partially; what is involved is rolled many times. Hence, men are said to be implicated when they are only under suspicion, or have taken but a small share in a transaction; they are said to be involved when they are deeply concerned. In this sense implicate is always used of persons; involve may be used of persons or things; both words being always metaphorically employed. Entangle is used either literally or metaphorically, and signifies to involve so that extrication is a matter of extreme difficulty.

implicate (im′pli-kāt), n. [< implicate, v.] The thing implied; that which results from implication.

The implicate of the moral imperative is not liberty but constraint. Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 95.

A great deal of the historic socialism has been regarded as a necessary implicate of idealism.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 206.

In his woolly fleece
I cling implicit. Pope.

2. Complicated; involved; puzzling. [Rare.]

If I had the ill nature of such authors as love to puzzle, I also might leave the foregoing enigma to be solved, or, rather, made more implicit, in such ways as philosophy might happen to account for.
Brooke, Fool of Quality (ed. 1792), I. 203.

3. Implied; resting on implication or inference; that may or should be understood, though not directly expressed; tacitly included.

Now that both the titles are conjunct, we may observe the symbol of an implicit and folded duty.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 170.

A good present behaviour is an implicit repentance for any miscarriage in what is past. Steele, Spectator, No. 374.

An implicit recognition of human fellowship when as yet there was no explicit recognition of it possible.
H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 151.

4. Involved in or resulting from perfect confidence in or deference to some authority or witness; hence, submissive; unquestioning; blind: as, implicit faith; implicit assent; implicit obedience.

Implicit faith is belief or disbelief without evidence.
Dr. John Brown, An Estimate, etc. (ed. 1758), I. 56.

Those parliaments . . . presume even to mention privileges and freedom, who, till of late, received directions from the throne with implicit humility.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lvi.

To him the whole nation was to yield an immediate and implicit submission. Burke, Present Discontents.

5†. Submissively yielding; unquestioningly obedient; trusting confidently or blindly.

A parcel of silly implicit fools had done the business for him. Tom Brown, Works, II. 30.

None of these great prescribers do ever fail providing themselves and their notions with a number of implicit disciples. Swift, Tale of a Tub, ix.

This curious dish
Implicit Walton calls the swallow-fish.
R. Franck, Northern Memoirs, p. 293.

Cecilia was peremptory, and Mary became implicit.
Miss Burney, Cecilia, x. 8.

Implicit contradiction, a contradiction which is not directly expressed as such; a contradiction implied or to be inferred: opposed to explicit contradiction, or contradiction in terms.—Implicit differentiation. See differentiation.—Implicit function. See function.=Syn. 3. Tacit.—4. Unreserved, unhesitating, undoubting.

implicitly (im-plis′it-li), adv. 1. By implication; virtually.

He that denies this [the providence of God] doth implicitly deny his existence. Bentley.

Their rights have not been expressly or implicitly allowed. Burke, Policy of the Allies.

2. Trustfully; without question, doubt, or hesitation.

Mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey.
Burke, Speech at the Conclusion of the Poll, 1774.

implicitness (im-plis′it-nes), n. The state of being implicit; the state of trusting without reserve.

impliedly (im-plī′ed-li), adv. By implication; so as to imply; virtually.

If a gentleman at the servant's request sends for a physician, he is not liable to pay the doctor's bill unless he . . . expressly or impliedly engages to be answerable.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 806.

imploration (im-plō-rā′shọn), n. [= F. imploration = Sp. imploración = Pg. imploração = It. implorazione, < L. imploratio(n-), inploratio(n-), < implorare, inplorare, implore: see implore.] The act of imploring; earnest supplication.

Wicked hearts . . . doe all they can to avoid the eyes of His displeased justice, and if they cannot do it by colours of dissimulation, they will doe it by imploration of shelter. Bp. Hall, Jeroboam's Wife.

implorator† (im-plōr′ā-tọr), n. [= F. implorateur = Pg. implorador = It. imploratore, < L. as if implorator*, < implorare, inplorare, pp. imploratus, inploratus, implore: see implore.] One who implores or entreats.

Do not believe his vows; for they are brokers;
Not of the eye which their investments show,
But mere implorators of unholy suits.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 3.

imploratory (im-plōr′ā-tọ-ri), a. [< implore + -atory.] Earnestly supplicating; imploring; entreating.

Cf. deplore.] I. trans. 1. To call upon in supplication; beseech or entreat; pray or petition earnestly.

They ship their oars, and crown with wine
The holy goblet to the powers divine,
Imploring all the gods that reign above.
Pope, Odyssey, ii. 472.

2. To pray or beg for earnestly; seek to obtain by supplication or entreaty: as, to implore aid or pardon.

I kneel, and then implore her blessing.
Shak., W. T., v. 3.

=Syn. Request, Beg, etc. See ask[1] and solicit.

II. intrans. To supplicate; entreat.

Who knows what tale had been to tell, if she Had met his first proud look all tearfully,
With weak imploring looks?
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 325.

implore† (im-plōr′), n. [< implore, v.] Earnest supplication.

With percing wordes and pittifull implore.

rain-water, situated in the middle of the atrium or hall, below the compluvium or open space in the roof. See atrium and compluvium.

The atrium contained a large quadrangular tank or impluvium. . . . On the west side of the impluvium, below the step of the tablinum, the pavement represented five rows of squares.
Baring-Gould, Myths of the Middle Ages (1884), p. 342.

imply (im-plī′), v. t.; pret. and pp. implied, ppr. implying. [< ME. implien, emplien, < OF. as if emplier*, var. of empleier, employer, < L. implicare, infold, involve: see implicate. Cf. employ, a doublet of imply, and see ply, apply, reply.]

1†. To infold; inclose; inwrap.

The wateres imedlyd wrappeth or implieth many fortunel happis or maneres [tr. L. mistaque fortuitos implicet unda modos]. Chaucer, Boëthius, v. meter 1.

Striving to loose the knott that fast him tyes, Himselfe in streighter bands too rash implyes.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 23.

And as a poplar, shot aloft, set by a river side,
In moist edge of a mightie fenne his head in curls implide,
But all his body plaine and smooth. Chapman, Iliad, iv.

2. To contain by implication; include virtually; involve; signify or import by fair inference or deduction; hence, to express indirectly; insinuate.

Your smooth eulogium, to one crown addrest,
Seems to imply a censure on the rest.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 92.

Whoever wishes to imply, in any piece of writing, the absence of everything agreeable and inviting, calls it a sermon. Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, iii.

Self-knowledge does not come as a matter of course; it implies an effort and a work.
J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 49.

All necessity for external force implies a morbid state.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 25.

Doctrine of implied powers, the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States grants to the government by implication powers in addition to those expressly defined in it.—Implied allegiance. See allegiance, 1.—Implied contract. See contract.—Implied discord, in music, a harmonic interval which is not in itself dissonant, but which forms part of a dissonant chord, as a minor third in a diminished seventh chord.—Implied interval, in figured bass, an interval not indicated, but understood, as where the third is implied by the indicated sixth. See figure.—Implied malice, trust, warranty, etc. See the nouns.=Syn. 2. Imply, Involve. The derivation of these words—folding and rolling one thing into another—is not particularly helpful in showing the difference between them. When a thing is implied, it is fairly to be inferred from the words used or the acts performed; when a thing is involved, its connection is necessary, so that the things in question cannot be separated. What is implied precedes in the order of nature, and is generally a thing left unspoken but understood; what is involved follows in the order of nature, and must be done or suffered. An action implies ability or preparation, and involves consequences. The act of signing an enlistment-roll implies that one is of age and otherwise legally able to enlist; it involves the necessity of obeying orders, enduring hardships, and incurring risks.

Experience implies failure, not failure every time, but failure one or more times, and the history of business proves that this implication is fully justified by fact.
L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 560.

It [feudalism] involved the presence on the soil of a large mass of men who had almost no rights.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 8.

In effect, it would be the most unjust and impolitick of all things, unequal taxation.
Burke, A Regicide Peace, iii.

It is always an impolitic thing to impose on a great power conditions so ignominious and dishonouring as to produce enduring resentment. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., i.

impolitical† (im-pō-lit′i-kal), a. [As impolitic + -al.] Impolitic.

It will be no difficult matter to prove that the Crusades were neither so unjustifiable, so impolitical, nor so unhappy in their consequences, as the superficial readers of History are habituated to esteem them.
Mickle, tr. of Camoens's Lusiad, vii., notes.

impolitically† (im-pō-lit′i-kal-i), adv. Impoliticly.

impoliticly (im-pol′i-tik-li), adv. In an impolitic manner; without policy or expediency; unwisely; indiscreetly. Tooke.

impoliticness (im-pol′i-tik-nes), n. The quality of being impolitic.

imponderability (im-pon″dėr-a-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. impondérabilité = It. imponderabilità; as imponderable + -ity: see -bility.] The quality of being imponderable.

imponderable (im-pon′dėr-a-bl), a. and n. [= F. impondérable = Sp. imponderable = Pg. imponderavel = It. imponderabile; as in-3 + ponderable.] I. a. Not ponderable; not capable of being weighed; without gravity.

No one wave of this imponderable medium [ether] can give the requisite motion to this atom of ponderable matter. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 13.

Spirit, which floods all substances with its life, is the solvent force quickening the imponderable essences.
Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 129.

II. n. In physics, a thing which has no weight: a term formerly applied to heat, light, electricity, and magnetism, on the supposition that they were material substances, and still used of the hypothetical universal medium, ether.

imponderableness (im-pon′dėr-a-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being imponderable.

imponderous† (im-pon′dėr-us), a. [< in-3 + ponderous.] Not ponderous; imponderable.

If they produce visible and real effects by imponderous and invisible emissions, it may be unjust to deny the possible efficacy of gold in the non-omission of weight, or deperdition of any ponderous particles.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

imponderousness† (im-pon′dėr-us-nes), n. The state or quality of being imponderous.

impone† (im-pōn′), v. t. [= Sp. imponer = Pg. impor = It. imporre, imponere, < L. imponere, inponere, pp. impositus, inpositus, put, place, lay, or set in or upon, set over, give to, < in, on, upon, + ponere, put, place: see ponent. Cf. impose.] To lay upon; lay as a stake or wager.

The king, sir, hath waged with him six Barbary horses; against the which he has imponed, as I take it, six French rapiers and poniards. Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

imponent (im-pō′nent), a. and n. [< L. imponen(t-)s, inponen(t-)s, ppr. of imponere, inponere, impone, lay on: see impone.] I. a. Imposing; competent to impose, as an obligation. [Rare.]

Were there no Church, . . . moral duties would still be associated with the imagination of an imponent authority, whose injunctions they would be supposed to be, though the authority might be single instead of twofold.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 323.

II. n. One who imposes; one who enjoins or prescribes. [Rare.]

Having previously discarded the imagination of Church or King or Divine Lawgiver as imponents of duty.

This storie is seyd nat for that wyves sholde Folwen Grisild as in humilitee,
For it were importable, though they wolde.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 1058.

Burdons that ben importable
On folkes shuldris thinges they couchen
That they nyl with her fyngris touchen.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 6904.

The tempest would be importable if it beat always upon him from all sides. Life of Firmin, p. 80.

importablenessᵗ (im-pōr′ta-bl-nes), n. The quality or state of being unendurable.

But when, by time and continuance, the mind is accustomed to it, though the yoke be the same, yet it finds no such severity and importableness in it.
Sir M. Hale, Preparative against Affliction.

importance (im-pôr′tans), n. [= F. importance = Sp. Pg. importancia = It. importanza, < ML. importantia, importance, < L. importan(t-)s, importan(t-)s, important: see important.] 1. The quality of having much import or moment; consequence; concernment; momentousness.

Their priests were next in dignity to the King, and of his Counsell in all businesses of importance.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 81.

Not a question of words and names, as Gallio thought it, but a matter of the highest importance to the world.
Stillingfleet, Works, II. i.

Maria writ
The letter, at Sir Toby's great importance.
Shak., T. N., v. 1.

The shortness of time, and this said bringer's importance is only the let [that] I neither send you spectacles, the price of the Paraphrases, nor thanks for your cheese.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 6.

importancyᵗ (im-pôr′tan-si), n. [As importance: see -cy.] Importance.

We consider
The importancy of Cyprus to the Turk.
Shak., Othello, i. 3.

important (im-pôr′tant), a. [< F. important = Sp. Pg. It. importante, < ML. importan(t-)s, important, momentous, prop. ppr. of L. importare, inportare, bring in, introduce, ML. (Rom.) signify, express: see import.] 1. Of much import; bearing weight or consequence; momentous; grave; significant.

The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day,
The great, the important day, big with the fate
Of Cato and of Rome. Addison, Cato, i. 1.

The recognition of the right of property in ideas is only less important than the recognition of the right of property in goods. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 160.

2. Consequential; pretentious; pompous: as, an important manner.—3†. [Appar. confused with importunate. Cf. importunate, 1.] Importunate; eager; pressing.

If the prince be too important, tell him there is measure in everything. Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1.

importantly (im-pôr′tant-li), adv. 1. In an important manner; weightily; forcibly.

It is not likely
That when they hear the Roman horses neigh,
Behold their quarter'd fires, have both their eyes
And ears so cloy'd importantly as now,
That they will waste their time upon our note,
To know from whence we are. Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 4.

2. Pompously.—3†. Importunately.

importation (im-pōr-tā′shon), n. [= F. importation = Sp. importación = Pg. importação = It. importazione, < ML. importatio(n-)*, < L. importare, inportare, bring in: see import.] 1. The act or practice of importing, or of bringing in or introducing from another country or state: as, the importation of live stock: opposed to exportation. Importation into the United States can be made only at ports of entry constituted by law. All goods, wares, and merchandise so imported must be entered at a custom-house by presenting a bill of lading, a statutory declaration of the importer describing the goods, and an invoice which, if one hundred dollars or more in value, must have been duly certified by the United States consul at the port or place of exportation. Entry may be made by an authorized agent or attorney if the importer is sick or absent. If the goods are free of duty, a permit to deliver is issued subject to official inspection and verification of the goods. If the goods are dutiable, the duties are estimated at the custom-house and paid in United States coin or equivalent government notes, and an order is issued to send at least one package out of every ten to the appraiser's stores for examination, the importer being permitted to take the residue under bond to produce them if called upon to do so within a specified time. Goods which are reported by the appraiser to the collector as being undervalued are subject to duty on the excess value, if the duty is ad valorem, and are subject to additional duty on the whole appraised value, varying according to the percentage of excess value, as a penalty. If the appraised value exceeds the declared value by more than fifty per cent., the entry shall be deemed presumptively fraudulent and the goods seized. An appeal may be taken on questions of value and protest made on questions of classification to one of the United States general appraisers and from him to a board of three United States general appraisers, whose decision is final on questions of value. Goods may be warehoused in bond for three years and may be withdrawn within that time on payment of duty, or for bonded transportation, or export without payment of duty. A drawback or refund of duty, less one per cent., may be obtained upon the exportation from a bonded warehouse of goods on which duty has been paid, and upon the exportation of goods manufactured from material on which import duty has been paid, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Goods may be transported in bond, without appraisement, immediately from the importing vessel at the port of first arrival to other ports of entry designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

2. One who or that which is brought from abroad; a person or thing brought into one country from another: as, the coachman was a recent importation; this umbrella is an importation. [Colloq.]—3†. The act of carrying or conveying; conveyance.

Can lay upon my sin. Shak., Much Ado, v. 1.

6. In printing, to lay upon an imposing-stone or the bed of a press and secure in a chase, as pages of type or stereotype plates. Pages or plates constituting a form or sheet are imposed in such order and at such intervals that they will appear in their right places and with the desired margin when the sheet printed from them is folded.

II. intrans. 1. To lay or place a burden or restraint; act with constraining effect: with upon: as, to impose upon one's patience or hospitality.

It is not only the difficulty and labour which men take in finding out of truth, nor again that, when it is found, it imposeth upon men's thoughts, that doth bring lies in favour. Bacon, Truth (ed. 1887).

2. To practise misleading trickery or imposture; act with a delusive effect: with upon: as, to impose upon one with false pretenses.

Do we hope to impose upon God, as we sometimes do upon men, by a mere form of godliness, without the power of it? Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xx.

The Catalogue alone of these Stamps, no bigger than two small Almanacks, cost me 14 Livres; so much Strangers are imposed upon by the Crafty Booksellers of Rue St. Jaques. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 106.

impose† (im-pōz′), n. [< impose, v.] Command; injunction.

According to your ladyship's impose,
I am thus early come. Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 3.

imposer (im-pō′zėr), n. One who imposes or lays on; one who enjoins or exacts.

The imposers of these oaths might repent. I. Walton.

imposing (im-pō′zing), p. a. Impressive; commanding; stately; striking: as, an imposing manner.

Acceptance of large grace. Milton, P. L., xii. 304.

4. In printing, the laying of pages of type or plates upon an imposing-stone or the bed of a press, and securing them in a chase. See impose, v. t., 6.—5. That which is laid on, enjoined, levied, enforced, or inflicted, as a burden, tax, duty, or restriction; specifically (in the plural), in Eng. hist., duties upon imports and exports imposed at the pleasure of the king.

Fortune layeth as heavy impositions as virtue.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 333.

All the commodities that go up into the country, of which there are great quantities, are clogged with impositions as soon as they leave Leghorn.
Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn), I. 491.

The order of the Jesuits was enriched by an imposition on the fisheries and fur-trade. Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 19.

Most important of all, there was the question of Impositions, that is, of the King's right to impose duties at will upon exports and imports. E. A. Abbott, Bacon, p. 120.

6. A trick or deception; a fraud; an imposture.

Being acquainted with his hand, I had no reason to suspect an imposition. Smollett.

In none of these [treaties of the United States with Japan] do we find as cunning devices of diplomatic imposition. N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 410.

7. An exercise imposed upon a student as a punishment; a task.

Literary tasks, called impositions, or frequent compulsive attendances on tedious and unimproving exercises in a college hall. Warton.

I may with justice
Accuse my want of judgment, to expect
He should perform so hard an imposition.
Shirley, Love in a Maze, iv. 1.

Case of the impositions. Same as Bates's case (which see, under case[1]).—Imposition of hands. See hand.

impositive (im-poz′i-tiv), a. [< in-[3] + positive, with ref. to impose.] Not positive. [Rare.]

He [the psychological speculator] requires it to be granted that his system is positive and that yours is impositive.
De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 275.

impossibility (im-pos-i-bil′i-ti), n.; pl. impossibilities (-tiz). [= F. impossibilité = Pr. impossibilitat = Sp. imposibilidad = Pg. impossibilidade = It. impossibilità, < LL. impossibilita(t-)s, inpossibilita(t-)s, < L. impossibilis, impossible: see impossible.] 1. The quality of being impossible; incapability of being or being done.

They confound difficulty with impossibility. South.

2. That which is impossible; that which cannot be or be done.

A poet without love were a physical and metaphysical impossibility. Carlyle, Burns.

The distribution of wealth which the Democratic programme demands is a scientific impossibility, and no laws could accomplish it. Mallock, Social Equality, p. 39.

3†. Helplessness; impotence.

When we say Lead us not into temptation, we learn to know our own impossibility and infirmity.
Latimer, Works (Parker Soc.), I. 432.

impossible (im-pos′i-bl), a. and n. [< ME. impossible, inpossible, < OF. (also F.) impossible = Pr. impossible, inpossible = Sp. imposible = Pg. impossivel = It. impossibile, < L. impossibilis, inpossibilis, not possible, < in- priv. + possibilis, possible: see possible.] I. a. 1. Not possible; non-existent or false by necessity. (a) Beyond the strength or power of the agent. (b) Not possible from the nature of things; contrary to a general principle or law of nature or of thought; that not only is not, and will not exist or happen, under actual circumstances, but would not be under any circumstances, within certain limits. (See possible.) The modes of specializing these limits constitute the differences between the variations of the meaning of the word, which are often distinguished by means of adverbs applied to the adjective impossible, or of the corresponding adjectives applied to the abstract noun impossibility. If the limits are the widest possible, so that no change either in the facts or laws of the universe could make the object spoken of real, the latter is said to be logically impossible: as A that is not A. So Berkeley maintains that a thing not thought of is logically impossible. If the principles of mathematics would have to be changed to make the object real, it is mathematically impossible: thus, it is mathematically impossible to turn a closed bag inside out; but if space had four dimensions, this could be done. It is in this sense that imaginaries are sometimes termed impossible quantities. By modern mathematicians mathematical impossibility is generally regarded as a higher grade of physical impossibility. If no change of special facts without new laws of nature would suffice to realize the object, it is said to be physically impossible: as a perpetual motion. But in a second sense this phrase means beyond the strength or physical resources of the agent, no matter what efforts he might make: thus, it is physically impossible for the Portuguese to overrun and conquer Africa. A supposed action utterly inconsistent with the moral character of the agent is said to be morally impossible. This phrase is also used to mean 'extremely improbable': thus, for a pitched coin to turn up heads and tails alternately for a hundred throws is morally impossible.

With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible. Mat. xix. 26.

It is impossible that any man should feel for a fortress on a remote frontier as he feels for his own house.
Macaulay, History.

Of what contraries consists a man!
Of what impossible mixtures! vice and virtue.
Chapman, Byron's Tragedy, v. 1.

Consciousness itself is impossible apart from limit.
Veitch, Introd. to Descartes's Method, p. clv.

2. In law, in a stricter sense, prevented only by the act of God or a public enemy. Whatever a person binds himself by contract to do, if not absurd, is not regarded as impossible in this sense, if it might be accomplished by human means, these obstacles only excepted; and his practical inability is not deemed to render performance impossible.

3. Excessively odd; not to have been imagined; such as would not have been thought possible: as, she is a most impossible person; he wears an impossible hat. [An affected French use.]

Is there a cupola ship changed to a broadsider, or an unserviceable three-decker converted into an impossible frigate, without costing the nation the charge of many Viceroys? Blackwood's Mag., XCVI. 605.

Impossible quantity, in math., an imaginary quantity. See imaginary.=Syn. Impossible, Impracticable. Impossible means that a thing cannot be effected or even supposed to be effected, being theoretically as well as practically incapable of accomplishment; while impracticable refers rather to a thing so hard to effect, by reason of difficulties, that its accomplishment is beyond our power and practically out of the question. Thus, it may be impracticable to extort money from a miser, but it is not impossible; or the construction of a railway over a morass may be impracticable, but not impossible if all considerations of outlay are thrown aside. It has been said that "nothing is impossible, but many things are impracticable." impossibly (im-pos′i-bli), adv. Not possibly.

II.† n. An impossibility. Chaucer.

impost (im′pōst), n. [In def. 1, < OF. impost, F. impôt, m. (= Pg. imposto, m., It. imposta, f.), < ML. impostus, m., imposita, f., a tax imposed; in def. 2, < F. imposte = Sp. Pg. It. imposta, f., an impost in arch.; < L. impositus, inpositus, pp. of imponere, inponere, lay upon, impose: see impone, impose.] 1. That which is imposed or levied; a tax, tribute, or duty; particularly, a duty or tax laid by government on goods imported; a customs-duty. To prevent interference with national commerce by the separate States, the Constitution of the United States (art. I. § 10) provides that "no State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws: and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States."

Slacken the reans of our late Servitude:
Lighten our gall'd backs of those Burthens rude,
Those heauy Imposts of thy Father.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Schisme.

Tithes were hated as an unequal and oppressive impost falling upon a people who were already sunk in the lowest depths of poverty, and religious feeling had little or nothing to say to the antipathy.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

2. In arch., the point where an arch rests on a wall or column; also, the condition of such resting or meeting. In classic architecture the impost is typically marked by a horizontal member; but in medieval work many different forms of imposts are used, and such horizontal members or moldings are frequently absent. Imposts have been classified as continuous imposts (see phrase below); discontinuous imposts, where the arch-moldings abut and are stopped on the pier; shafted imposts, where the arch-moldings spring from a capital and are different from those of the pier; and banded imposts, where the pier and arch have the same moldings.

Continuous Impost.

We do find his wound
So festered near the vitals, all our art,
By warm drinks, cannot clear th' imposthumation.
Webster, Devil's Law-Case, iii. 2.

The imposthumation is supposed to have proceeded, not from his fall last year, but from a blow with a tennis-ball. Walpole, Letters, II. 247.

impostume†, imposthume† (im-pos'tūm), n. [< OF. empostume, a corrupt form of apostume, and that of aposteme, an abscess: see apostem, aposteme, of which impostume is thus merely a corrupt form.] A collection of pus or purulent matter in any part of an animal body; an abscess.

And such imposthumes as Phantaste is Grow in our palace? We must lance these sores.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 3.

I have learned nothing but that the Prince of Orange died of an imposthume in his head.
Walpole, Letters, II. 271.

impostume†, imposthume† (im-pos'tūm), v. [< impostume, n.] Same as impostumate.

How can an imposthumed heart but yield forth evil matter by his mouth? Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

imposturage† (im-pos'tū-rāj), n. [< imposture + -age.] Imposition.

Many other practices of human art and invention, which help crookedness, lameness, dimness of sight, &c., no man is so foolish as to impute to the devil's invention, or to count them any hurtful imposturage.
Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 127.

imposture (im-pos'tūr), n. [= F. imposture = Sp. Pg. It. impostura, < LL. impostura, inpostura, deceit, < L. imponere, inponere, pp. impositus, inpositus, impose upon, deceive: see impone, impose.] The act or conduct of an impostor; deception practised, usually under a false or assumed character; fraud or imposition.

Form new legends,
And fill the world with follies and impostures.
Johnson, Irene.

Tis more than strange; my reason cannot answer
Such argument of fine imposture.
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, ii. 3.

= Syn. Trick, cheat.

impracticability (im-prak″ti-ka-bil′i-ti), n. [< impracticable: see -bility.] 1. The character of being impracticable.

There would be a great waste of time and trouble, and an inconvenience often amounting to impracticability, if consumers could only obtain the articles they want by treating directly with the producers. J. S. Mill.

2. Untractableness; stubbornness.

impracticable (im-prak′ti-ka-bl), a. and n. [= F. impraticable = Sp. impracticable = Pg. impraticavel = It. impraticabile; as in-[3] + practicable.] I. a. 1. Incapable of accomplishment; not to be practised, performed, carried out, or effected by the means at command.

Every scheme of public utility was rendered impracticable by their [the barons'] continual petty wars with each other. Mickle, tr. of Camoëns's Lusiad, Int.

2. Incapable of being used; unfit for the purpose intended or desired; unserviceable; unavailable; of persons, unmanageable; untractable.

The fiction of a material finite universe, moving forward in an infinite empty space, cannot be admitted. It is altogether unreasonable and impracticable.
Clarke, Leibnitz, Fifth Paper.

A poor impracticable creature! I tried once or twice to know if he was fit for business; but he had scarce talent to be groom-porter to an orange-barrow.
Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, ii.

=Syn. 1. Impossible, Impracticable. See impossible.—1 and 2. Impracticable, Unpractical. The meanings of the two words approach each other at two points, but still are clearly distinct: (1) Of a thing: impracticable, not possible to be done without expense or sacrifice greater than is advisable; unpractical, not dictated by or in harmony with the lessons of experience in actual work: as, an unpractical plan. (2) Of a person: impracticable, not easily managed; unpractical, not showing that sort of wisdom which is the result of experience in affairs.

II. n. One who is unmanageable, unreasonable, or stubborn.

A body of men chosen without solicitation of their own . . . would scorn such work, but the lawyer regards them generally as . . . impracticables.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 762.

impracticableness (im-prak′ti-ka-bl-nes), n. The character of being impracticable.

The greatest difficulty in these sieges was from the impracticableness of the ground.
Bp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times.

And indeed I do not know a greater mark of an able minister than that of rightly adapting the several faculties of men; nor is any thing more to be lamented than the impracticableness of doing this in any great degree under our present circumstances. Swift, Present State of Affairs.

impracticably (im-prak′ti-ka-bli), adv. In an impracticable manner.

Morality not impracticably rigid. Johnson.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn), I. 439.

Impregnating-tube. In certain forms of fungi the antherid arises by the side of the oösphere, either as a branch from it or terminal from a hypha near it, and is applied closely to its wall, through which it sends a delicate tube, the impregnating-tube. Through this tube the gonoplasm enters the oösphere, and the act of impregnation is accomplished.

II. intrans. To become impregnated or pregnant. [Rare.]

Were they, like Spanish jennets, to impregnate by the winds, they could not have thought on a more proper invention. Addison, Spectator, No. 127.

impregnate (im-preg′nāt), a. [< impregnate, v.] Rendered prolific or fruitful; impregnated. [In the second extract impregnate is used by mistake in the sense of impregnable.]

There Juno stopp'd, and (her fair steeds unloos'd)
Of air condens'd a vapour circumfus'd:
For these, impregnate with celestial dew,
On Simois' brink ambrosial herbage grew.
Pope, Iliad, v. 968.

Bring me the caitiff here before my face,
Tho' made impregnate as Achilles was.
D'Urfey, Two Queens of Brentford, ii.

★ impregnation (im-preg-nā′shon), n. [= F. imprégnation = Pr. impregnacio, enpregnacio = Sp. impregnación = Pg. impregnação = It. impregnazione, < ML. imprægnatio(n-), < LL. imprægnare, inprægnare, impregnate: see impregnate.] 1. The act of impregnating, or the state of being impregnated; fertilization; fecundation.

Impregnation is the physical admixture of protoplasmic matter derived from two sources, which may be either different parts of the same organism, or different organisms.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 32.

2. Intimate mixture of parts or particles; infusion; saturation.—3. That with which anything is impregnated.

What could implant in the body such peculiar impregnations? Derham, Physico-Theology
